Regulation and Protection

Mr. J. C. Stubbs, the personal representative of Mr. E. H. Harriman at the Trans-Mississippi Congress, speaking of the need of more and better railroad facilities in this western country, said that the money needed therefor is not likely to be obtained unless confidence in the productiveness of railroad investments is restored; "until cooperation and good will become manifest in the relations of the people and the carrier and so pervades the public mind as to find expression in legislative bodies." In other words the demagogue must be suppressed and railroad-baiting must cease to be a popular pastime. In view of the great change that has taken place in public sentiment with respect to Mr. Harriman, whose name is synonymous with railroad octopus, we are inclined to the opinion that the beneficent consummation which Mr. Stubbs commends is not far distant. But you never can tell. We can be fairly certain only of this,—that there is not so much enthusiasm these days for the performances of the bull in the china shop as formerly. The dinner pail having been kicked over the achievement does not seem to be worthy of ardent approval. The hour of the man of constructive ability has come. The execration of Roosevelt is coeval with the apotheosis of Harriman. The fickle public has transferred its affections. In all sections of the country there is clamorous demand for the resumption of the work of extending railroads into growing territory, and wherever Mr. Harriman goes he is hailed as the conquering industrial hero. Terrible Teddy and "Battle" Bob being sensible of public feeling, have quit lambasting Harriman and are now dealing in glittering generalities with reference to iniquitous combinations of capital. Mr. Harriman has lately been felicitating himself in public on the great improvement that has taken place in public sentiment toward railroad management. And in New York the other day he took occasion to remark that the public will derive more benefit from protection to railroads than from regulation thereof. To that end, he said, we should have a modified Sherman act which would permit railroad managers to get together in public and make agreements in public. A year ago Mr. Harriman would have been bitterly reprobated for making such a suggestion, but since the business disturbance of last fall railroad regulation has ceased to be regarded in some quarters as essential to national well-being. It has gradually dawned upon Mr. Roosevelt that the industries of the country cannot prosper if the transportation companies are not permitted to make money enough to keep their roads in good physical condition and to meet the demand for increased facilities. And Mr. Roosevelt has learned that if the interstate commerce law had been enforced soon after its enactment there would have been no trouble; that it was not to the interest of railroad managers to engage in secret rate-cutting or to give rebates. As a matter of fact railroad managers repeatedly importuned the Government to enforce the law, and they were told that it could not be enforced and that the commissioners should have increased powers. Mr. Roosevelt himself said the law was ineffective. Yet all the prosecutions which have been successful were made under the original and not under the amended act.

Long's Glorification

Ephemeral is the glory achieved even by the most upright of our self-sacrificing heroes in public office. Take for example the case of our handsome young City Attorney, Mr. Percy Long, who was acclaimed one day last week by all the papers for his signal victory over the water octopus. It was a proud day for a gallant public servant who had fought a great battle against an enemy of the pee-pul and triumphed. It seemed as though at one bound young Mr. Long, hitherto merely an inconspicuous ornament of his profession, had taken his place among the leaders of the bar. Naturally he was flushed with elation but bearing his blushing honors with becoming modesty he expressed the delicate sentiment that not to him but to the long-suffering ratepayers were felicitations due. For as many as twenty-four hours Mr. Long occupied his pedestal with grace and gratification. Then came the pricking of his bubble glory. Analyzed by some of our unemotional, matter-of-fact lawyers, Judge Farrington's decision proved to be something entirely different from what to novices it seemed on superficial examination. Mr. Long having read the decision with a preconceived notion of what it should be, extracted from it only such juices as were pleasing to his adolescent palate. The sour pulp he rejected. It appears that there is nothing in this decision to justify the bestowal of felicitations either on Mr. Long or the ratepayers.

The Decision

Judge Farrington has not given the octopus all it asked for, but neither has he sustained the position of the octopus-baiters. Though he failed to accept the water company's valuation of its property, neither did he affirm the Supervisors' estimate to be a fair basis on which to establish rates. The company's estimate of $52,000,000 is of course exorbitant, but this probably was made on the principle on which the man who loses a finger in a railroad accident sues for $50,000 damages in the hope of recovering about $2,500. Judge Farrington estimated the value of the water plant at $27,500,000 and Mr. Long in his colossal innocence assumed that the court had determined upon this sum as the valuation of the plant for all purposes. And Mayor Taylor, who is regarded by doctors as a good lawyer and by lawyers as a good doctor, jubilantly concurred in Mr. Long's conclusion, but we hope not for the purpose of humbugging the dear pee-pul. Yet it is hardly credible that Mayor Taylor regarded as a triumph a decision that grants a fifteen per cent raise of rates and allows the claim of the company to a certain percentage of revenue for depreciation of plant. Mayor Taylor is a man of infinite variety; is the fool among the characters in the repertoire with which nature has endowed him? Surely he does not believe it to be of no importance that the water company has a brand new principle established for its benefit. And surely he knows that Judge Farrington's estimate of the value of the property is of no benefit to the people. That estimate is merely to serve as a basis on which to determine the main question involved in the suit. It is binding for no other purpose, but even though it were, in view of the fact that the city was offered the plant for $26,000,000 less than two years ago we are unable to see wherein we have gained any great advantage. Unquestionably the octopus is as well pleased with the decision as Mr. Long appeared to be during the brief period in which his curious achievement was being celebrated. As for the ratepayers it is perhaps to be hoped that their fund of optimism is not exhausted, and that they will continue to derive much pleasure from the efforts of their servants under the guidance of Mr. Phelan to cinch the public service corporations. In time of course they will have to buy the Spring Valley plant, and the longer they wait the greater will be the sum they will have to pay, but the demagogic clicque at the helm of affairs is in no hurry to extinguish one of the most prolific sources of political capital.

"The New Bryan"

It is being remarked that the perennial candidate, who is now spoken of in some parts of the country as "The New Bryan," has become singularly moderate and reasonable. He appears to have abandoned most of his old incendiary convictions and to be eager to create the impression that he is safer and saner than he was in 1896 and 1900. But unfortunately for Mr. Bryan he postponed too long the trimming of his sails for the current breeze. The notion is firmly imbedded in the public mind that Mr. Bryan is an infallible and incurable menace to peace and prosperity. So great is the dread of Bryan that the psychological effect of his election would be a shock so powerful as to paralyze the business interests of the country. From this shock they would not recover until after Bryan was inaugurated, when perhaps it would turn out that his potentiality for evil had been greatly exaggerated. It is unfortunate for Bryan that we are still suffering from a severe shock and cannot afford to invite another, for almost irresistible is the inclination to administer to Mr. Roosevelt through his protege the rebuke that he so richly deserves. Aside from the widespread feeling of revolt roused by Mr. Roosevelt's indecent misuse of the influence inseparable from his great office in forcing the nomination of his own pet candidate, there is an almost overwhelming sense of disgust at the apparent willingness of Mr. Taft to stagger through this campaign beneath a nauseating incubus and to permit himself to be used as the proxy whereby the President will cram himself down the gagging gullet of the sovereign people. How humiliating it will be to Mr. Bryan to realize that despite the propitiousness of an unparalleled situation he was hopelessly impossible!

Bryan As a Newspaper Asset

The most unkindest cut that Mr. Hearst has made or authorized to be made against William Jennings Bryan, is the editorial statement that when Bryan was beaten the first time the Hearst newspapers hired him to write articles, "and paid him for writing them at least ten times what they were worth, in order that he might have money to live until the next campaign." This sounds like an algebraic equation of the nth degree in which there are two unknown quantities, namely, what Mr. Bryan's articles to the Hearst newspapers were worth to Mr. Hearst and what Mr. Hearst paid Mr. Bryan for the articles. Thus, binominally, it may be expressed in this manner: X plus y in the second degree is equal to the second power of x plus 2xy plus y in the second degree. The known quantity is Mr. Bryan. As a newspaper man Mr. Bryan was once worth $25 a week; but Mr. Bryan the newspaper man plus Mr. Bryan the Democratic candidate for the Presidency is Mr. Bryan the newspaperman multiplied by ten newspaper men worth $25 a week. Therefore the market worth of Mr. Bryan to a newspaper or a string of newspapers, was $250 a week at the close of his first campaign for the Presidency. If Mr. Hearst paid Mr. Bryan ten times his worth he paid him $2500 a week; but the problem does not state that Mr. Bryan was hired by the week on this basis; it expressly states that Mr. Bryan was paid by the article. Now Mr. Bryan has demonstrated in his late correspondence with Mr. Roosevelt that he can write an article of average newspaper length every day and at the same time attend to the ordinary business of conducting a Presidential campaign. Mr. Bryan's average output for the Commoner in the off years when he is not running for the Presidency is not a criterion by which to judge of Mr. Bryan's writing capacity, because his work on the Commoner is a labor of love, utterly devoid of all mercenary taint. Say, then, that Mr. Bryan wrote one article for Mr. Hearst each week at ten times its intrinsic worth, he received from Mr. Hearst $357 for each article, the presumption being that the calculation was made on a basis of six working days to the week. If Mr. Bryan wrote a thousand words per article he was paid a little more than 35 cents a word, which would put him in the Jack London class and about fifty per cent below the Kipling class as a literary asset. According to the assertion of Mr. Hearst that he paid Mr. Bryan ten times the amount of the worth of his articles, it is easy to calculate that Mr. Bryan's articles were worth to Mr. Hearst only $37.50 each, the remaining $321.30 paid for each of the articles being cold charity bestowed by Mr. Hearst to preserve Mr. Bryan from starvation from one campaign to another. It was cruel, however, to expose Mr. Bryan's utter indigence and his abject dependence on the Hearst bounty, in the manner that Mr. Hearst has done. Mr. Bryan has not deserved such humiliation at the hands of one who was once his generous patron.

The Great Commercial Contest

The Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress, which has just closed its nineteenth annual session in San Francisco, has not received the consideration to which it is entitled from the commercial interests of the Pacific Coast. Like many another semi-official organization, promoted by wide-awake, far-seeing business men, the association has been deprecated and discredited on the ground that its efforts are directed by private interests and that it is used for personal aggrandizement. Nevertheless the Trans-Mississippi Congress bids fair to become one of the most potent factors in the commercial development of this western country. Its objects are apparent—the amalgamation of the cities and sections west of "The Father of Waters"; the extension of South American, Oriental and South Pacific trade; and the welding of those territories to the western trade channels of the United States before the completion of the Panama Canal. In these objects we are deeply concerned, and it is well to be sensible and mindful of the fact that they are not to be achieved without effort. The fact is that there is to be considerable rivalry for the trade which we hope to command. This rivalry is already in process of development. While the Trans-Mississippi Congress was in session here the Lakes-to-Gulf Deep Waterways Convention was budding forth in Chicago. This organization has for its object the widening and deepening of the Mississippi from Chicago to New Orleans to facilitate the passage of ocean-going steamers into the very heart of the middle west. Though agitated by an association much younger than the Trans-Mississippi Congress, the Mississippi movement has gained tremendous strength and influence and already shows compactness and unity of purpose. It has behind it the power and co-operation of seventeen States, all tributary to the Mississippi, whose combined population is ten times that of the Pacific Coast. They include the great granaries of Nebraska, Iowa and Kansas, the metallic wealth of Minnesota and Michigan and the vast cotton acreage of Louisiana, Alabama, Tennessee, Arkansas, Georgia and Mississippi. The bond of unity is signed by Chicago, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Pittsburg, Memphis and New Orleans—all pledged to work in harmony for the achivement of their great purpose. What is the ultimate object of the Lakes-to-Gulf Deep Waterway? Nothing more nor less than the conquest of commercial China, Japan, India, Australia and Malaysia, made possible by the construction and completion of the Isthmian Canal This stupendous business, year by year assuming larger proportions, is to be diverted from the ports of the Pacific Coast to New Orleans and Chicago, leaving San Francisco, Seattle, Tacoma, Portland and Los Angeles sidetracked and folorn. The traffic of the Golden Gate, that great bull's-eye of western commerce, is to be quietly but firmly removed to the delta of the Mississippi by means of the Lakes-to-Gulf Deep Waterways Association, aided by the National Rivers and Harbors Association and the federal government. An armada of merchant marine is expected to wrest from the western world the trade of the Pacific seas. Steamships plying between Chicago and Hong Kong are to divert traffic from the trans-continental railroads between San Francisco and the east. Denver and Salt Lake City, no longer needed as trans-shipping points, are to become mere trading posts. A startling picture, but the realization of it is hardly more than a dream. That there is keen rivalry ahead, however, we may be fairly certain.

The Divorce Industry

Sad days are fallen upon Sioux Falls, South Dakota, famed in song and story for a score of years as the "only reliable," "quick and painless" establishment for the relief of matrimonial dyspepsia. No longer does the happy laughter of children (whose parents have just secured their final decrees) echo down the city streets. No longer does the eager, wistful populace gather at the depot, watching for eastern and western divorce seekers. No longer does the hotel clerk, with a naughty wink, consign Mrs. Sadly-Wed to the bridal suite and send hurried messages to his lawyer-friends who gather thereabout. Alas, no—the courthouse is closed for repairs, the judge has gone fishing, the trains disgorge only milk cans and mail bags, and the good old days are gone. Competition, the life of trade, has destroyed South Dakota's chief industry. All the choice trade of the country is now divided between San Francisco and Reno. For quick action non-residents prefer the sagebrush town to the California metropolis, but the native son and the native daughter can stay at home and get results without any difficulty. Even Judge Graham can do no more toward discouraging divorce than to suggest terms of reconciliation. If you cannot get a divorce by collusion owing to the stubbornness of your erstwhile better half, you need have no reluctance to engage in a contest. Arrange a public exhibition of your family skeleton—say from two to four on Wednesdays. It is no longer fashionable to keep them in a musty old closet, along with grandfather's sword and Uncle Benjamin's duelling pistols. If your wife never thrashed you at the opera or a large reception, call the chauffeur and the kitchen maid into court and they'll give testimony that will make her blush and bring her to time. If you are a lady and your husband is stubborn, threaten to involve some of his friends. There are so many ways of getting a divorce that no one need languish in the wearisome state of matrimony.

Lady Cook's Suffragette

Lady Francis Cook has crossed the pond to take a hand in the campaign. Lady Cook is for Taft, and she is ready to put at his disposal a corps of speakers guaranteed to make the welkin ring, but—naturally there is a "but" to be disposed of before the speakers are introduced, for Lady Cook, though a suffragette, is above all things of her sex typical. "If," says Lady Cook, "Mr. Taft is willing to use his influence to bring about the emancipation of American women I shall put at his disposal the corps of speakers I have already engaged, but if he is not in sympathy with our movement then he shall receive no aid from me." So it is up to Mr. Taft to declare himself on the suffrage question, but it will not be sufficient for him merely to express his sympathy as President Roosevelt did when Lady Cook called on him. According to Lady Cook "President Roosevelt has lost the opportunity of sending his name thundering down the ages by the side of Abraham Lincoln's." When Lady Cook told Mr. Roosevelt that Lincoln had freed the black slaves and that it was for him to free the white slaves, he replied, "Lady Cook, if I thought that the women wanted the suffrage I would give it to them." How like the artful politician! How typical of the Omnipotent One who stands ready to give the dear pee-pul anything they want from anarchy to imperialism regardless of the Constitution or any other minor obstruction! But the soft answer of the President soothed not the aching soul of Lady Cook. For Lady Cook is herself no tyro at the political game. She can differentiate a hawk from a handsaw, palaver from the language of sincerity. Consequently Mr. Taft is not to win the services of her skirted spellbinders with equivocation. To get the backing of Lady Cook Mr. Taft must "pledge himself to work actively for the alteration of the Constitution in such a way as to give the ballot to women." Lady Cook, who before her marriage to the titled purveyor of India shawls was Tennessee Claflin, is very much in earnest. She was one of the most strenuous pioneers in the fight for the enfranchisement of women, and is now one of the largest contributors to the treasury of the English suffragettes. She has returned to her native country to fight for her cause and incidentally to persuade somebody to make obsolete right away the law of the land which declares that having married an Englishman she is no longer an American citizen. "Isn't it an outrage," she said recently, "to think that I, whose ancestors came over in the Mayflower, whose parents, grandparents and great-grandparents were born here, and who lived here all my life until I was married, should be regarded as an alien and not even have the privilege of making a will in the country? I am a rich woman and I want to invest my money in my native land. I want to spend it for the advancement of my own countrywomen, and when I die I want the property I have to be used for the benefit of the objects in which I have been interested. And why can I not do these things? Simply because I have no individuality." Lady Cook, despite her foreign marriage, is evidently an American patriot, and she is surely deserving of assistance in her efforts to have the law abrogated.

The Final Lesson

By Arthur Stringer

I have sought beauty through the dust of strife,
I have sought meaning for the ancient ache,
And music in the grindling wheels of life;
Long have I sought, and little found as yet
Beyond this truth: that Love alone can make Earth beautiful, and life without regret!

Perspective Impressions

Apparently Mr. Hisgen is running for office to boom his axle grease. The Hisgen brand is in every speech.

Wonderful is the recuperative power of the male conscience when its possessor reaches satiety.

Mr. Rockefeller boasts that he now eats three meals a day. The popular supposition is that his object in business is not to let anybody else eat one.

Mr. Hearst says that no respectable man wants to meet Mr. Heney, and Judge Melvin has given color to this invidious observation.

"Pauduveris," says Burns, "wrote the letter to throw us off the track." This is the first time that Burns has confessed to being on the Greek's track. Perhaps he's on Detweiller's track too! You never can tell.

Ostrich farming, the Chronicle tells us, is becoming a world-wide pursuit. Which reminds us that one of the salient habits of the ostrict is cultivated in all sections of the globe.

A police commissioner who has contracted the gumshoe habit caught several saloon-keepers in the tenderloin violating regulations the other night. Nothing like having a vigilant Administration for all purposes. By the way, our President was once a police commissioner and he played the detective too. And of course the President is worthy of emulation in all things.

Mr. Taft has been explaining that golf is not the game of the plutocracy, but rather the pastime of the plain people. Incidentally he has sought to mollify religious bigots by informing them that he obtained the permission of several prominent Protestant clergymen before discussing the Philippine friar question with the Pope. What an awful tough thing it is to be a candidate for President! And how easy it is to explain too much!

The Hon. James D. Phelan in the course of a speech recently in Colusa, made the statement that the loose banking methods of the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company were known to bankers several years before that institution failed. As those "loose methods" were criminal methods why did Mr. Phelan withhold information which might have enabled depositors to protect themselves? Why did he give Walter Bartnett a certificate of character immediately after the failure?

Poetry and Science

Showing How a Famous Mathematician Who Is Also a Noted Astronomer, Hitched His Wagon to a Galaxy and Traversed the Depths of Immeasurable Space, at Night, With Urania, the Star-Eyed Goddess, to Pay His Devoirs to Calliope, the Mother of All the Muses.

By Democritus

Professor Edgar Lucien Larkin, the eminent savant and all-round scientist, drops into poetry as easily as our old friend Silas Wegg was wont to decline from the fall off of the Rooshian Empire into gentle dalliance with the languorous muses. Read this exquisite gem from his recent brief but comprehensive review of the "Infinite Wonders of the Galaxy": "From here the Galaxy puts on a display of supernal splendor. It is a majestic robe of night, and hangs up folds of stars in Austral skies, scarcely above the sea, and by the earth's rotation drags the careless garments in the waves." Swinburne in his most voluptuous mood could have written nothing more suggestive than this, and Swinburne, you remember, in his "Mater Triumphalis," pictured "the world as a new-born maiden," standing "virginal and splendid as at birth"; and Swinburne wrote also of "the floors untrodden of the sun's feet-glimmer, the star-unstricken pavements of the night." But Swinburne never compared the Galaxy to a star-spangled night-robe, a "careless garment" that, like a bath-robe, drags along shore in the wake of a lady just emerging from the waves at Carmel-by-the-Sea, where poets and literary folks are as plentiful as "shells on the shingle" from "seas full of wonder and peril."

Our poet-scientist tells that in the great telescope "a scene of magnificence and beauty bursts upon the startled eye beyond all power of words in description." He then proceeds to describe the "scene" by asking us to "break a diamond into a thousand minute particles, strew upon a black velvet in a darkened room and turn on a myriad electric lights." This recipe for an imitation Milky Way, he says, "would give a crude idea of the telescopic appearance of the galactic floor on a clear, dark night." Professor Larkin's description of something "beyond all power of words in description" is excellent beyond any power of my words to praise; but in all candor I must say to this poet-scientist that I prefer the description of one who was merely a scientific poet. Alfred Tennyson, by name, who many a night from yonder ivied casement, ere he went to rest, did look on great Orion sloping slowly to the West; many a night he saw the Pleiades, rising through the mellow shade, glitter like a swarm of fireflies tangled in a sliver braid. This preference, however, is only a matter of personal taste in poetry. No doubt there are critics more competent than I am, who will rank Larkin higher than Tennyson in the art of astronomical prosody.

The stellar floor, we are informed by Professor Larkin,, is of the color of a pure pearl. Behind, or in between the points, is "a shimmer and sheen of surprising delicacy—cosmic light." The nature of this light is unknown, and Professor Larkin does not think it is gas light because he knows that gas light cannot shine "in frigid space, at absolute zero, unless nature possesses more cold light than that joined to heat." Herein we observe the conflict of science with poesy in the Larkin hypothesis. He is not content to let the "shimmer and sheen" of the cosmic universe illuminate his imagination, but he must bring his reason to bear on the phenomenon, seeking to penetrate the secret of the "shimmer," and to solve the mystery of the "sheen." The poet who is but little familiar with the doubts and guesses of the scientist wings his flight from star to star of "night's immeasurable dome," unhampered by "data," unfettered by "calculations," "spectral analysis" and the "angle of parallax." There is Poet George Sterling, for one example. I do not believe that Poet Sterling knows more of astronomy than he has learned from an ordinary manual on that science, yet in his "Testimony of the Suns" he has dreamed more things of the heavens and the sidereal universe than Scientist Larkin has observed through his "great telescope." Poet Sterling makes no vague guess as to the cause of the "shimmer and sheen" of cosmic light; but tells us in plain poetical language that it is a mist where met the random suns—"in changeless moulds of law it runs to orbs that roam anew the dark, and unto which the worlds are born, where life awakes to know again the light of stars, caress of rain, and winds of the forgotten morn." The Galaxy he says is a "dim veil of fire," "a mist upon the vassal skies," "a flare upon the midnights around Altair," "a portent to barbaric eyes." I hope that professor Larkin will pardon me for preferring the astronomy of Poet Sterling's poetry to the poetry of Scientist Larkin's astronomy.

Among other "infinite wonders of the Galaxy," Professor Larkin has discovered a lot of dark spots "startling black chasms," "rents, fissures, openings or windows, looking beyond into the unknown." These, he says, lead to inconceivable deeps, which reminds him that there are deeps in the human mind also, and that if "a non-mathematical mind could secure one momentary glimpse of the depths of a mathematical mind—a hopeless impossibility—it (the non-mathematical mind) would be filled with astonishment as great as that experienced when peering into caves in the starry floor." It is perhaps needless to add that Professor Larkin's mind is a "mathematical mind." I know from the experience of frequent effort how fruitless is the attempt to secure even "one momentary glimpse" of Professor Larkin's fathomless mind; that intellectual galaxy is striated with the most "startling black chasms" I have ever seen; yawning "rents and fissures," vast "openings or windows, looking into the unknown," immeasurable depths of the profoundest thought, illimitable areas of incognoscibility and incalculable expanses of cryptic erudition.

It is not necessary, therefore, that Professor Larkin should be a poet like Tennyson, Swinburne or Sterling; no more necessary, in fact, than that Tennyson, Swinburne and Sterling should be astronomers or even scientists like Professor Larkin. Poets are born; they are not made. Scientists are never born; they are evolved. Poets are exotic and sometimes erotic; scientists are endogenous, like the moss on the bark of a tree, deriving their vitality from the sap of ages and absorbing their wisdom from the atmosphere of material things. When a poet is also a scientist we may doubt both his poetry and his science; but when a scientist is also a poet we can only doubt his poetry. Poets have used the materials of science transmuting them in the alembic of their genius from gross tangibility into shapes of the airiest fancy; but whoever heard of a scientist whom nature had also endowed as a poet? Professor Larkin is not an exception; he writes poetry about science, it is true; but he is not really a poet. And for one I am glad that it is so. If Professor Larkin were a poet there would be no fathomless depth to his mathematical mind; it would be as shallow as a purling brook babbling to green fields—a mere shimmer and sheen of surpassing delicacy; like spangled starlight or the borrowed glory of thirty dozen moons. A poet would not as Professor Larkin has done, reveal the Galaxy in her night-robe; he would have first drawn the curtain of twilght and pinned it with a single star—a Galaxy shimmering and sheening amid folds of stars in Austral skies is not really as poetic as it sounds, the image lending itself as it does, to comparison with the scant, tinsel attire of the horselady of the circus who bestrides three proud and prancing steeds. I hope that Professor Larkin will not waste more of his time and mine in poetry; there are other more important matters in his mathematical mind that we are yearning to have lifted from that fathomless depth, and we fear that if he dallies with the wanton muse he will forget to upheave the weightier mass of his scientific lore.

The Vanishing Empire of the Turk

A Flood of Light Thrown on the Bulgarian Revolt, on the Macedonian Question, on the Character of Several Interesting Peoples, and on Austria-Hungary's Successful Experiment in Colonization.

By Victor Franko

Having recently made a trip through Turkey and neighboring countries, and being somewhat familiar with the conditions out of which sprung the political differences now agitating the European Powers, I have been asked by the editor of Town Talk to give the readers of this paper a little information on the subject. To get at once to the very root of the trouble, I will stare that the Bulgarians who have declared the independence of their country, which has been a tributary Turkish State under a Christian government since the Berlin Treaty of 1878, have been in a state of revolt for four years. When I was in Sofia in 1904 Bulgaria was in the throes of a great crisis, the people being deeply affected by the sufferings of their kinsfolks across the border, and the Macedonian question was becoming every day more acute. War at that time seemed inevitable. The Macedonian question had its root in the tribal wars most of which are provoked by the Abanians, a barbarous people who, with the connivance of the Turkish authorities, have been pillaging, murdering and driving out the Christians. Until I reached Salonica on my journey I heard of nothing but insurrections. At Salonica I found the atmosphere wholly different from that of the rest of Macedonia. The town is of great beauty, and has much to attract the traveler, even if he is not searching for political, ethical or religious problems. From the bright sunlit quays along the shores of the blue Aegean we see in the far distance the hazy outlines of the mountains of Chalcidice and Thessaly, and on very clear days even the mighty Olympus. Here and there, amid shady courts, we come upon wonderful Byzantine churches adorned with rich marbles and brilliant mosaics. Most of them have now been converted into mosques, but the mullahs are quite willing to act as ciceroni to giaours for a consideration. In the former church of St. Demetrius the Christians are even allowed to hold religious festivals, and to worship the shrine of the saint on certain days. When strangers visit the building the mullah does the honors; a Mohammedan priest reciting in Turkish the story of the miracles of a Christian saint, his words being translated by a Hebrew dragoman into French, constitutes one of the strangest medleys of religions and languages to be found even in this confused land! Salonica has also a magnificent circuit of Byzantine walls, second only to those of Constantinople in extent, somewhat like them in construction, and in certain ways finer, for they are built on a steep hillside, and plunge down to the sea from a great height. During the preceding summer and autumn Salonica was perhaps the only place in Macedonia where absolute security prevailed.

From Salonica we proceeded to Monastir, the center of the Bulgarian insurrectionary movement, a town of no great beauty, where the dogs lie about by day for you to tumble over, and keep you awake by their howling and barking by night. There are many races in Monastir. The Greeks claim it as a Greek town, but of genuine Hellenes there are very few. The Bulgarians are very numerous. I spent several months at Monastir, mingled with the various peoples and studied their ways, their political views and their aspirations. I found the Bulgarians to be the steadiest and most reliable of all the Macedonian tribes. They are not brilliant, nor very attractive, but they have political insight and great strength of character.

One of the reasons that has made Western Europe so apathetic with regard to the Macedonian question is the prevailing idea that all the inhabitants of the Balkan lands belong to the category of "Levantine Christians." The type from which the idea is derived is the mongrel trader or loafer of the Mediterranean ports, who is certainly an undesirable person, and it is supposed that all the other Christians are like him, the Turk being the only "gentleman" of the lot. And yet one can hardly conceive of a greater difference than that between the sober, silent, hard-working Bulgarian and the loquacious, clever but frivolous Hellene who prates of the "Grand Idea" and the revived Greek Empire, in the streets and cafes. If people could only realize how different the Bulgarians are they would understand the Macedonian question a great deal better.

The Mohammedans form the most turbulent element in the town; some of them, especially the Turks and the Pomaks (Mohammedan Bulgarians) are very fanatical, while the Albanians think more of plunder than of the Prophet. It is not likely that they would be ready to indulge in massacre were it not for the mullahs who from time to time come to stir them up from Stambul, and for the attitude of the authorities. With regard to the mullahs, a Lazarist missionary told me that one of them

In Exile

By Henry Kistemaekers

I had made up my mind to go down into my cabin when a rather elegant but melancholy looking passenger approached me on the upper deck. "A beautiful night," he remarked.

"Extraordinarily beautiful!"

"Do you land in Alexandria?"

"Yes, tomorrow morning."

"We touch there about daybreak. As you will see for yourself, the picture of Alexandria as it takes shape in the golden and rosy glow of an Egyptian daybreak is a sight like some enchanting fairy scene. There is only one spot in the world that is more bewitching, and that is Paris! Do you know Paris?"

"It is my native city," I returned.

"Just as I thought—I felt it. Even blindfold I can single out a Parisian in any crowd."

He leaned over the ship's railing, watching the phosphorescent arabesques that formed in the wake of the moat. Then he murmured: "What a happy man you are!" He turned suddenly on me, his eyes flashing wildly and fixed his gaze steadily on me. "You are an extremely fortunate mortal—you do not realize your good fortune. You have before you a man who adores Paris; one who has Paris in his blood, in his veins—and one who will never see Paris again. Can you imagine anything more ghastly?"

"Are you exiled?" I queried.

In a tone that was most matter-of-fact he answered: "Far worse than that. I am dead!"

My features must have betrayed my sensations at such a confidence, for he answered rapidly: "Don't be frightened; you are not confronted by a maniac. Don't look up at the rigging so anxiously; you are in absolutely no danger, for I am the sanest and most peaceable man in the world. My story will prove it—of course, you must guess that there is a story to tell, inasmuch as I claim to be dead, and you see me here alive in the stern of this boat. Have you five minutes' time to give me?"

I thought it best to humor him and nodded assent, seating myself on one of the deck benches.

He lit a cigar, placed himself opposite me, and began: "Have you ever heard the name Saint Mai?"

"I know not only the name but also the works of that great master," I answered. Are you going to tell me something about him?"

"Exactly—about the famous Saint Mai, author of 'Heracles,' the thousandth performance of which took place last night; about the creator of "Marie,' and "The Woman of the Sabots'—in short, all of those works that have had such tremendous successes in the last ten years. I want to tell you about Saint Mai, who died without having tasted of fame——"

"Well, what about him?"

"Only that it is all a mistake and that Saint Mai is alive. Don't look so surprised, for it is just as true that he is alive as that I am here before you. In fact, the cases are one and the same, for Saint Mai and I are one and the same person."

"'Oh!" I cried, and my voice sounded my alarm.

"True! It was just about ten years ago that I began to vegetate. A concert of my compositions had been noticed with the most prominent indifference; my opera, 'Marie,' had flattened its nose against the portals of the Opera Comique, and bore the honor of having been the greatest failure since that of 'Carmen' was recorded in the annals of modern French music My portfolio was bulging with unpublished works, and I withdrew to a small corner of Brittany to ruminate over my fate and to economize in my expenditures. It was during this retirement that one fine morning I got hold of a Paris newspaper and discovered in it the announcement that I was dead! A laconic dispatch from some news agency brought the information that I had been shipwrecked in a bark. I have never been able to discover the motive of the news correspondent who reported me dead; but as a matter of fact this incident decided my career."

"How is that possible?"

"Let me proceed: When I read this news item the first impulse that arose in me was to race to some telegraph station and contradict the report. The nearest telegraph office was four miles from my place of seclusion. On the road there I pondered the matter and realized that it would cost me one sou per word to contradict the report, and that a telegram would have to be sent to each one of the ten prominent Paris newspapers. The total cost of all this telegraphing would have made a fearful hole in my meagre purse. As I considered these things I gazed out upon the ocean from the high cliff, and the thought flashed across my mind: It might be a very interesting thing to discover just how much of an event my death would be, and what would be said about me after my death. So I decided to wait until the following day before recalling the news.

"Without burdening you with a lot of details, let me assure you that I had a magnificent lot of press agents. Some of my intimate friends tried to besmirch me with mud by spreading some evil reports about my private life; but they only succeeded in raising me in the estimation of those people who had known me personally, and the latter praised me to the skies. Within comparatively few hours I was made an object of most tender consideration. I became the object of laudatory magazine articles—they are not very difficult to write, for the formula is ready at hand and there exist numberless phrases that were coined at the time of Bizet's death and are still available as models. In short, it was unhesitatingly asserted that I had been a genius. My opera, 'Marie,' which had been a failure, was hurriedly put on the boards again and had a tremendous success. At the Paris Grand Opera, in the archives of which the score of 'Heracles' had been slumbering, every effort was made to produce that work—and at its premiere it was frantically applauded.

"Meanwhile I was still in Brittany. I had come to realize my position and did not dare risk endangering my successes by breaking the silence. I was mightily convinced of the fact that the position of a dead composer was much easier than that of a living one—the dead composer finding a ready publisher for his works and eager manager to produce them—and thus he achieves a success that living composers can dream of tasting only after their death. I am in a position to assert this!

"And now let me tell you the rest of my story: I had a nephew who was absolutely without morals, and I determined to press him into service. Carefully disguised and with precautions of secrecy of which you can have no idea, I hunted him up, this conscienceless young man, and made him a proposition. After much deliberation we arrived at an agreement that my death was to be declared a suicide; the evidences were to be found in the letter that I had supposedly written my nephew on the evening before my death. In this letter I named him as my sole heir. Other documents that gradually came to life confirmed this disposal of my property. At the point on the coast where I was supposed to have been wrecked my nephew found some of my belongings that the sea had thrown back, and among them was my portfolio containing valuable manuscripts.

Harvey Protests

"I hesitate to believe that Town Talk, once in possession of the fact will fail to make the amende honorable for the implied and expressed accusations against me in its issue of September 26th." Thus Mr. James Clarence Harvey in a letter to me from New York. The accusations to which Mr. Harvey alludes were not made by Town Talk. They were made by members of the Bohemian and Family clubs, and were commented upon in these columns. The comments were made on the assumption that Mr. Harvey's accusers were truthful in their assertions with reference to his playful deceptions. I inferred that the distinguished wit of clubdom, the man who had excited the admiration of Bohemia by his amazing facility in composition, had imposed somewhat on the credulity of his friends with no other incentive than an itch for adulation. While regretting that I served as an instrument for the propagation of unwarranted criticism I am pleased to learn that Mr. Harvey was guiltless of intention to create a false impression of his talents. But let us give ear to his explanation: "This is the height and depth of mine offense. I wrote rambling rhymes at random times, on current happenings, simply because they seemed to please, making no claims for merit, making no bets on spontaneity, as averred, and giving what I had to give as freely and happily as those genial California boys gave to me of their good cheer and fellowship. I was indebted to the Bohemian Club and the Family Club more deeply than I can ever repay for broad Western hospitality and constant courtesy which made California a delight. The reporters and not the facts have made it appear that a grievance exists for attempting to perpetrate a joke at the expense of the Family Club. No bet was involved in the writing of a ten-minute song. The verses were impromptu, at a previous occasion, and I believed that Messrs. Weil and Pike could duplicate a previous occurrence, which they did, to their credit and to the amusement of a band of jolly fellows, in a spirit befitting the time and place. In the affections of club members there, I feel quite secure, despite the press, but I do not care to pose as a practical joker with your readers outside the clubs."

A Tribute Not a Plagiarism

Perhaps the most serious of the accusations made against Mr. Harvey was that a poem which he read at the midsummer jinks of the Bohemian Club, and which was supposed to be an original production, contained lines that had been borrowed from John Boyle O'Reilly. The discovery of the plagiarism was attributed to Mr. James D. Phelan. Now comes Mr. Harvey and mildly resents the impeachment of his literary integrity. "As to the lines delivered in the redwoods," he says, "please note that:

I'd rather live in Bohemia than in any other land, is quoted and is followed by this:

So spake the soul of the poet, with the touch of a master hand,
The good, old, grey-haired singer is at rest, beneath the sod,
But that which was best and brightest, his song-soul, now with God,
Can never die in Bohemia, for he laid, before her shrine,
A wreath of rhyme immortal, with the burst of a thought divine.

"If," says Mr. Harvey, this tribute to the dear, dead poet is theft, it is of the kind that he would have countenanced, surely. There was no claim that the verses were written for the occasion, in fact, they are in my book, 'In Bohemia,' and many present had the book, for it sold better in California than in any other State. I made some trifling changes which, perhaps, made the lines seem to fit the hour and I was made most happy by the kindly words spoken about them. Why dilute my delight?"

Was Jimmy Sore?

It seems rather curious that in a matter of this kind echoes of the graft prosecution should obtrude. It also seems rather curious that a stranger from New York should be able to divine the motives that are engendered in a situation peculiar to San Francisco. Again give ear to Mr. Harvey: "I found Mr. Phelan most courteous and can hardly believe that he would voice thoughts to wound a fellow verse-maker. I was indebted to Mr. Pat Calhoun for many courtesies. Perhaps it was too much to hope for to please both gentlemen. In justice to the members of two of the most hospitable clubs in the world, I feel that Town Talk should assure its readers that the perpetration of a joke or an imposition of any kind upon them is the last thing on earth I should dream of attempting. It would take a brighter man than I am to pull the wool over the eyes of men who give annually such entertainments as the High Jinks and The Flight of the Stork. What I had to give, in the spirit of the moment, I gave, claiming nothing, betting nothing, regretting only that I could not make better return for countless kind words and the clasp of many a friendly hand."

She—"Do you rember that thirty years ago you proposed to me and I might have said no."
He—"That's one of my most treasured recollections."

Barrett's Fine Front

Conspicuous among the distinguished citizens who attended the Trans-Mississippi Congress was the Hon. John J. Barrett, professional diplomat, and perennial envoy to something or other. Apparently Mr. Barrett is permanently attached to Uncle Sam's payroll. Administrations may come and Administrations may go, but Mr. Barrett glides on forever. Glides is the word, because Mr. Barrett is never obtrusive or noisy. Never is there any friction caused by the movements of Mr. Barrett. He holds his job after the manner of the average man holding his breath. And through years of job-holding he has acquired experience that must be valuable to his superiors as well as to himself. At present he is Director of the American Bureau of South American Republics, which position seems to entitle him to a roving commission in the interest of the President. In time he served his country in divers capacities, and always with urbanity. He is especially successful in any mission that requires a pleasing address and a good front. I believe that Mr. Barrett was born with these qualifications. It is related of him by unofficial biographers that even when he was a humble reporter in Portland, Oregon, his front was tiptop. And during his newspaper career it is said he exhibited considerable ingenuity in sustaining his front, for despite a meagre salary he lived at the swellest hotel in the town. He obtained his first taste of public office during the administration of President Cleveland. He went to Washington to plead the cause of a job-chaser who had not the slightest chance of getting appointed. The Barrett front caught the Cleveland eye. "Suppose I offer you the job?" Cleveland suggested. Barrett's reply has not been recorded, but he got the job.

For the Benefit of the Octopus

The Trans-Mississippi Congress brought with it considerable disappointment. It was thought that several hundred delegates were coming to town, and the managers of the principal hotels subscribed to a fund for the entertainment of the visitors, thinking that they would derive a good deal of profit from the Congress, but only seventy-five delegates put in an appearance. A railroad official asked me if I knew the reason why there was so small an attendance. As I did not, he volunteered information on the subject. "No more passes," he said, with a smile. "Did you ever stop to think," he asked, "how good the reformers have been to the octopus?" I had never given the matter a thought. "Well, in the first place," he went on, "they've prohibited the issuance of passes. The politicians and the man with a pull must now buy their tickets. In the second place they've made it a sin for a railroad company to contribute to a campaign fund. Thus they have saved the railroads many thousands of dollars, and as a consequence all the campaign committees are broke. Mr. Harriman has no kick coming to him."

The Bishop Was Touched

Femininity in distress made a strong and successful appeal to Bishop Nichols a few weeks ago. Mother and daughter, apparently in possession of all the elements of respectability and refinement, presented themselves to the good Bishop one day, and after explaining that they were strangers in a strange land, told him of the loss of a purse containing all their ready cash. Would the Bishop appreciate their temporary embarrasment and kindly tide them over the few days that must elapse before they received money from home. To be sure he would. And to be sure he did. About fifty dollars was all they needed. But they would like the Bishop to guarantee them at a very respectable hotel. Which he also did. And a little later the Bishop paid the bill, for the ladies had disappeared without settling the account. Curiously enough the appearance of these interesting women is described in a circular which has been going the rounds of the hotels and up and down the State. It appears that they are indebted to every inn keeper in these parts whose hospitality they have enjoyed. As they carry all their luggage in suit cases they have no difficulty in getting away without serious inconvenience.

Tricked the Cub Duck Hunter

Jack Rice played a rather measly trick on one of his gun club mates on his return from the opening of the duck season. He was a new member, just initiated, a bubbling, effervescent, irrepressible young chap, with a new gun, new togs, new ideas and chipper new ways. On the first morning out he abandoned his assigned blind and slipped into a station near Rice's, and there he committed flagrantly noisy excesses in ill-timed jubilation every time he dropped a bird. Ducks were plentiful along the lower reaches of the Sacramento river and all the members got the limit. Rice, still rankling, returned to town Friday with his own bunch and with several commissions from his fellows to see to the distribution of their bags among friends, as per the cards tied to them. Among the lot was the string of the new member. Rice, with a worn smile, said that he would turn the whole shipment over to the proper delivery company when he reached town. With feelings born of what he had suffered in the blind, Rice on his arrival here obtained a number of tags of a well-known local firm of poulterers and, after copying and destroying the original tags, carefully tied them to the new member's ducks and sent them on their way. When the chipper member arrived in town, brisk and expectant of extravagant congratulations from his friends, he was hailed with a storm of chaff. In a rage he hunted up Rice. Those familiar with that individual's ready tongue know what a squelching he received. The new member distributes his own ducks now.

Scattering the Pot Hunters

The only croakings that greeted the opening of the season came from the pot hunters that infest the Klamath watershed country, where the government has recently sequestered a small principality and stopped hunting, in an effort to preserve various game birds. For years this natural haunt and breeding place of water fowl was the paradise of pot hunters. Not only did they slaughter countless thousands of birds any old way at all seasons, but they shipped them to market here by careless, obsolete methods and more than half the birds were spoiled in transit. Aside from this line of destruction many of the Indians and white people living around the lakes gathered tens of thousands of wild duck eggs each year to sell to nearby storekeepers who shipped them to manufacturers of foods, to be used in place of hen's eggs. Between the egg hunters and the pot hunters the bird life in this great breeding domain was being rapidly wiped out. The government's action in protecting this territory means added decades to the wild fowl life of the Coast.

The Demon In the Army and Navy

In the light of recent developments in American army and navy circles—more noticeably those of the past eight or ten months—a course at West Point or Annapolis seems to mean proficiency in the art of accumulating "jags." Only the ability of most of the graduates from those institutions to "stand firm" under a torrid fire of highballs and rickeys, combined with the natural esprit d'corps which springs from association with mutual dangers, has prevented a hundred courtmartials within the past half-year. Of these things I have been reminded by the sad misfortune that has overtaken the son of America's "one-best-bet," Rear-Admiral Robley D. Evans. Frank T. Evans, a lieutenant in the navy, is facing court-martial for drunkenness while on duty and disobedience of orders from a superior officer, with a possibility of dishonorable discharge from the service.

Get Rid of Them

No reasonable man desires to make prohibition the rule of the army and navy. To be sure Kipling has written:

"But when you're out for slaughter
You will do your work on water;
An' you'll lick the bloomin' boots o' him what's got it."

However, there is no occasion for the officers and men of our protective forces to deny themselves a glass or so of wine. In fact, it lubricates fighting machinery in superior fashion. Dinner in the ward-room mess would indeed be "dry" without a cup to cheer. In the long watches of the night, with a cold wind a-flying and a choppy spray a-dashing, hot toddies serve an indispensable turn. But the man who cannot govern himself in the matter of liquor, and who consequently drinks too much, has no place in the executive departments of the army or navy. He cannot expect to govern his men, or a ship's course, nor the movements of an army. Hard as it may be in individual cases, these men should be dismissed from the service peremptorily. Not with a dishonorable discharge to the accompaniment of the rattle of drums and blare of trumpets, but without noise or notoriety. If their conduct is bad, their example is bad; and the efficiency of the service cannot but be impaired by the continuance of their presence in it.

Some Sample Cases

The case of Lieutenant Evans is one of many. Numerous disgraceful escapades in the army and navy have been justly attributed to drunkenness, and even a fatal disaster is believed to have been more or less due to a greater fondness for the bar than for the boilers. The story is told of a captain of coast artillery, who appeared one morning at the Presidio to inspect guard mount. He was top-heavy with liquor. His fatigue cap was blown off, and stooping to pick it up he fell to his knees and was unable to get to his feet again. No brother officer stepped forward to assist him, and finally, to the amusement of three thousand soldiers drawn up to "attention," he crawled from the parade ground to his lodgings on all-fours. He was courtmartialed, reduced in seniority, and permitted to resign. In New York City two weeks ago a member of the coast artillery was placed on trial for drunkenness, coupled with misappropriation of his company's funds. A lieutenant swore that he saw the accused take half a dozen drinks within the space of a few minutes. He could not remember ever having seen the accused absolutely sober. These instances of excessive inebriety are perhaps not commonplace in the service, but they are significant of a laxity of discipline which should not be tolerated.

"Hello, Billy, I hear the campaign is getting hot out in your district."

"Yes, we had an exciting meeting last night between a graphaphone and a phonograph."

Some Charity Questions

Apropos my recent comments on the subject of organized charity, a correspondent desires to know whether I am aware that a great deal of the organized charity in these parts is not charity at all; that, for example, the hospitals which contain "endowed beds" receive no patients that are not able to pay, and that "endowed beds" are really nothing more than beds that have been donated by generous persons. From another source I learn that Fabiola Hospital of Oakland is not a free institution in any sense of the term, and that there are hospitals in San Francisco for which "benefit entertainments" are given every year and to which no poor person who is unable to pay is ever admitted. In the circumstances it would be interesting to learn in what form the charity of these institutions is expressed. When the people are asked to contribute for the support of a hospital is it merely to the end that the managers of the establishment shall be able to give luxurious accommodations and fine service at low rates? If so then every person who avails himself of the low rates is partaking of the bounty of the people, and the people are helping to support an institution for the benefit of a privileged class—for only those persons who are not indigent. Of course it is not likely that any hospital which obtains support through the medium of "benefit entertainments," and that accepts "endowed beds" is conducted for the profit of anybody, but upon what theory are these hospitals which accept donations conducted if not for the benefit of the poor? The benighted author of these speculations is eager for enlightenment.

He Sipped From Her Slipper

Since the Atlantic fleet started on the trip around the world nowhere have the officers had so jolly a time, I am told, as at Honolulu, and in that city the gossip over the teacups is still spiced with reminiscences of the visit. Echoes of one of the most enjoyable of the many sprightly episodes that contributed to the gaiety of the battleship sojourn have lately been wafted across the waters. The chief figures in the episode were a young officer and a charming matron. The officer entertained a number of Hawaiian representative society people aboard his ship and among them were the matron and her husband. At the dinner the gallant officer presented the matron with his sword, his belt and a bunch of swagger sticks. A tallyho drive followed the dinner and the party enjoyed a late supper at a beach hotel where the lights went out. The leading feminine spirit ordered candles, which she placed in the empty champagne bottles, by the light of which the young officer attested his admiration for the matron by that crowning feat of knightly devotion—sipping champagne from my lady's slipper. The next morning when the officer awoke aboard ship and prepared for quarters, he became aware that he no longer possessed his sword and therefore could not comply with regulations. He made a hurried call on the lady of the damp slipper and found her bereft of the sword. Now, according to the gossips, the sword and the swagger sticks, broken, were found in the lady's lily pond. Query: Who threw them into the pond?

"I hope you are a regular communicant," said the pastor, kindly, to the young German.

"Yes," he replied, "I catch the 7:45 boat every morning."

The Prophecy of de Blowitz

Toward the close of his eventful life, de Blowitz, the famous Paris correspondent of the London Times, declared that the next great European war would have its rise in Austro-Hungary. He fixed the cause either on the death of the present emperor and the disintegration of the conglomeration of states existing there, or on the contention of the great powers over the sovereignty of the petty states lining its southern border—the same territories on which the expectant eagles are ready to swoop the moment the hour of the dismemberment of Turkey is seen approaching. At the time de Blowitz ventured this prophesy there was hardly a more competent critic of European affairs. Not only was he in elbow touch with the premiers, ambassadors and representatives of the leading powers, but he enjoyed the "inside" confidence of the most of them. Proofs of this intimacy were given time and again. It was evidenced in spectacular fashion when he made his world-wide scoop by securing the clauses of the Berlin Treaty and forwarding them to his paper before it was signed. This is the same treaty which the Emperor Franz Joseph virtually tore into shreds last week when he declared the sovereignty of Austria over Bosnia and Herzegovina.

Scooped the Press of the World

This historical feat in journalism on the part of de Blowitz caused a deal of scandal in diplomatic circles. Bismarck was particularly wroth. But de Blowitz, worldly-wise courtier that the was, scrupulously and steadfastly concealed the source of his information, notwithstanding the long and secret processes taken to discover it. Years afterward it developed that a member of the Congress read each clause of the treaty to himself privately in his own room on the day it was adopted, while de Blowitz was ensconsed in an out of the way position to overhear the reading. In a Pickwickian sense it was understood that the reader was discussing the clause with himself and was not communicating with anyone or showing any paper connected with the business of the Congress. The crucial moment with de Blowitz arrived on the last day when the final clause was adopted. That clause must be obtained almost instantly on its adoption to save the scoop for any quarter hour thereafter some indefatigable correspondent might succeed in getting a general outline or the secretary might be instructed to turn the articles of the completed treaty over to the press for publication. de Blowitz had prepared for the emergency. His friend of the occasion went to a nearby hotel for luncheon and left his overcoat conveniently hanging on a rack in the hall. In a pocket of the coat was the all-important final clause. de Blowitz happened into the hotel a few moments later and hung his coat on the same rack. He ate only a snack and left hastily. In passing out he took his friend's overcoat and a few minutes later a special courier was posting to a distant town from which it was "safe to wire it to London."

Kind Lady—"Come back this evening after 8 o'clock and I will get you something from my husband."

Beggar—"Impossible, ma'am, the union forbids me to work overtime."

Bewitching Edna

Edna Wallace Hopper is once more figuring in a love affair through which she is getting valuable publicity. This diminutive actress is without a peer among the self-boomers of the stage. She is seldom out of the limelight. Twenty years ago little Edna Wallace whisked her skirts from the local promenade and started on her eventful stage career in an obscure one-night-stand company that was touring the provinces of the Middle West. She had been on the stage less than a year when she met De Wolf Hopper, who was then on tour as the star of a comic opera company. The big comedian fell desperately in love with the midget from California, and after a brief courtship they were married. Hopper did for Edna Wallace what Nat Goodwin did for Maxine Elliott—made her his co-star and exalted her among the topnotchers of the profession. The Hoppers played a very brief engagement together. Agreeably to both they were set adrift by the divorce court, and ever since, from the newspaper stories that have been propagated at brief intervals one might imagine that little Edna is always on the point of taking another husband.

Her Love Affairs

First came the report that she had fascinated Tod Sloan, who was then in the zenith of his career on the turf. Next came a Mr. Gallatin, a millionaire, who was said to be badly, madly smitten. In time he recovered, and a little later the piquant little actress was being felicitated on her conquest of the son of a millionaire, none other than the brother of the lady whose rumored engagement to an Italian Duke has been the subject of comment for months. Elkins was said to be in Edna's train on one of her visits to this city on business connected with the contest over the Dunsmuir millions. In time Elkins ardor was assuaged, and now we learn that A. O. Brown is under the bewitching woman's spell. Brown is a New York broker who recently went to smash after paying $7,500 for an automobile for his fiance. During the investigation of his affairs in court the other day it was learned that in accordance with the terms of his engagement with the fair Edna he had his life insured in her favor for $25,000. From this it appears that the actress does not neglect business opportunities even when tender sentiment prevails over her emotions.

Mrs. Caller.—"How delightfully you play. Does your husband play too?"

Mrs. Nouvean—"Oh, yes, he plays the races."

A Letter From Fighting Bob

Frank J. Symmes is the happy possessor of a letter from "Fighting Bob" Evans. The letter is in answer to a telegram congratulating Evans sent by Symmes on the day the Admiral left Washington and literally retired from public life. It is of interest in that it is virtually a message to all California and is the only word "Fighting Bob" has sent out to a grateful people since his retirement. Dated at the Lake Mohonk Mountain House, Mohonk Lake, N. Y., the letter reads as follows: "Dear Mr. Symmes: It was awfully kind of you to think of me on the 18th and I sincerely thank you for the kind words contained in your message. California people can never love me as I love them and you are the chief of them all. You will be glad to know that I am growing well and strong again and that I hope in a few weeks to be better

Ethics of the Mesozoic Age

A correspondent desires me to tell him why he never heard of Professor Merriam's recent great find until he read of it in the pages of Sunset. "Here is some more ethics," writes my correspondent; Professor Merriam is a paleontologist employed by the State to teach his science to the students of the State University. In the intervals of teaching Professor Merriam has been engaged in original research among the debris of the triassic division of the Mesozoic series. It is presumed, of course, that Professor Merriam has not defrayed the expense of this work out of his salary. This presumption, however, may be wrong; Professor Merriam himself will be excellent authority on this point. In the course of his investigations Professor Merriam made a rich find of vertebrate mammals peculiar to the period in which modern paleontologists love to rummage—the dark backward and abysm of time when ichthyosauria crawled in the slime and ooze of a pre-fossiliferous deposit of red sandstone; long before the megatherium slumped clumsily through the dense forests of Devonian ferns; contemporaneous with the machaerodus or sabre-toothed cat. It is customary, when an employe of the State University has made research and discovered something new or useful for the general public to issue a "bulletin" setting forth the main features of the discovery. I don't know whether this "bulletin" is obligatory or not; neither do I know whether Professor Merriam issued such "bulletin" regarding his excursion into the trackless wildernes of the triassic period. It is possible that the "bulletin" was issued and that the daily press took no heed of it, being engrossed with exposition and discussion of more modern themes fraught with greater human interest. Anyway, the first information that I received of Professor Merriam's very important salvage from the wreck of ancient matter was through an article in the Sunset Magazine, for which, I imagine, he was well paid. Now for our "ethics": Assuming that Professor Merriam did not issue a "bulletin" containing the particulars of his "find"; assuming also that such "bulletin" is obligatory on all employes of the State University; and assuming that Professor Merriam sold information obtained at the expense of the State; did he commit an "ethical wrong" in the sense that Mayor Taylor uses that vague and apparently contradictory term? I shall not undertake to answer my question. My data is too meager, and I am not agile enough in this instance to jump at a conclusion. If Professor Loeb should discover the source of life in the University laboratory and sell the secret to a magazine before he had reported to the Regents and the taxpayers of California, I would not hesitate to ask the great biologist to refund the amount of his fee from the magazine to the public treasury; but even in that instance I should have to be sure that Professor Loeb had profited from a "scoop" that of right belonged to the employers of Professor Loeb. In the meantime, however, I submit my assumption as an ethical hypothesis for the philosophical consideration of Professor Howison, the eminent moralist of Berkeley and of Mayor Taylor, the eminent ethicist of San Francisco.

He Did His Duty

I am pleased to report that Professor Merriman did bulletin his discovery before writing of it for Sunset. Why the news of it failed to get into the dailies is a question I am unable to understand. It is somewhat remarkable that in so important a matter a monthly magazine should have scooped the daily press. To Editor Aiken belongs the credit of having made excellent use of a tip which he received. Editor Aiken has an instinct for news and realizing that a Berkeley professor had made a great contribution to the store of scientific lore he opened negotiations for the story. The question that interests me more than the ethical one is why did the University authorities fail to spread the news of the great discovery? It is not sufficient for them to reply that their bulletins are accessible to the press. The bulletins of scientists are seldom calculated to excite the curiosity of reporters. Even in his magazine article Professor Merriam failed to gratify all legitimate and natural curiosity. The point that I wish to make is that Professor Merriam achieved something that reflects great credit on the University, far more credit I am sure than a victory of the football team, and yet no member of the faculty saw fit to exploit it for all it was worth.

Swatting the Hayes Brothers

Charley Shortridge has been celebrating the birthday of his paper, "The Times," which he started in San Jose for the purpose, as he said, of teaching the Hayes brothers manners. It was predicted by the Hayes faction that the paper would peter out in six months, but it began its third year last week, and Editor Shortridge took occasion to remind the people on the natal anniversary of his prosperous journal that he had "driven the corrupt Hayes gang from power in the city of San Jose." He added that they are still to be driven from power in the county of Santa Clara. Meanwhile "Red" Hayes is running for Congress in the Fifth District and he is running on his record as a reformer and his opposition to Speaker Cannon. What the reform record is nobody knows, but Hayes has confidence in its drawing powers.

When Willie Came to Town

The recent appearance of Mr. Hearst on the public platform in this city is very much to be regretted. Mr. Hearst has given fresh impetus to the roaring tide of dialectical ditchwater which was rapidly subsiding at the time of his arrival. Before Mr. Hearst came to town the case of Mr. Spreckels against everybody who is onto him was becoming of little more importance to the community than the suit of Bardell vs. Pickwick. All sensible men having grown weary of the greatest confidence game that was ever played on a too susceptible people the Spreckels temperament was gradually being eradicated from the body politic; the exhalations and emanations from the malodorous souls of the lackeys of journalism were becoming innocuous; locomotor ataxia was affecting the limbs of the raddled old Columbine Cant in the ballet of morality, the chief feature of the screaming pantomime of civic patriotism, when Willie mounted the bema and braved the dead cats of his shrieking enemies. And now the battle is on once more, and the Spreckels poison of hatred is being sown as industriously as ever.

The Meeting

The Hearst meeting unquestionably was a very spirited affair. Ned Hamilton's account of it in the Examiner was by far the most accurate report published. According to the organs of the Spreckels propaganda Mr. Hearst was hooted off the stage. This statement is about as true as anything that ever appears in those organs with reference to matters affecting Mr. Spreckels' interests. At the close of his speech Mr. Hearst sat down with the applause of the audience ringing in his ears. Mr. Hisgen was introduced and had ingratiated himself with the audience before Mr. Hearst withdrew. That Mr. Hearst was made the victim of a concerted organized effort to humiliate him and drive him off the stage was apparent, but it was frustrated by the audience, which was clearly in sympathy with the speaker. It is denied on behalf of Sleuth Burns that he marshaled the mob of disturbers, but he was there and his agents were in consultation with him, and they were the toughest looking lot of individuals that ever infested a community.

The Argument of Anarchy

Assuming that the reports of the reception to Mr. Hearst, emanating from the muddy source of self-interest, are true, what must we think of the mob that thus labored to gag the freedom of speech? What must we think of newspapers that would gloat over the success of the effort? Suppose it was Mr. Heney instead of Mr. Hearst who had been subjected to the treatment which the graft organs say was accorded to Mr. Hearst? Would the graft organs have approved the action of the mob? It may be answered that the attitude of these journals towards Mr. Heney is quite different from their attitude towards Mr. Hearst. Certainly if Mr. Heney had been driven from the stage with "hoots and boos and hisses and derisive laughter," the graft organs would not have applauded the display of hoodlumism; they would not have called the riot merely a "hostile demonstration"; and they would not have declared that the voice of the mob was the voice of "the people." Yet, in all fairness, Mr. Hearst was entitled as a citizen to the same treatment that the graft organs will insist should be given to Mr. Heney. Under the Constitution of the nation both are guaranteed the right to address their fellow citizens freely and in the exercise of this right they must not be "abridged" either by laws censoring their utterances or by mobs packed for the purpose of "hooting, booing and hissing" them off the stage. Hoots, boos and hisses in a free country are the only answer that anarchy can give to arguments that displease the anarchists.

Heney's Mental Affliction

Mr. Heney, we are told, issued a challenge to Mr. Hearst for a public debate upon the question: "Have the statements of the Examiner upon questions and issues relating to or connected with the graft prosecutions and on the court proceedings in the graft cases been fair, truthful or justifiable?" Since the issuance of that challenge it has been made clear that Mr. Heney is absolutely incompetent to discuss the truthfullness or accuracy of newspaper reports. For many months I have been quite sure that Mr. Heney was afflicted with mental euthanasia; that the strain of the graft prosecution has been too much for him; that he was seeing things that were not and saying things without the faintest conception of the nature of his utterances. And now comes confirmation of my judgment. In a speech delivered in the Baptist church in Oakland a few months ago Mr. Heney characterized Judge Harry Melvin as "a man no better than a boodling Supervisor." Last Saturday Mr. Heney, meeting Judge Melvin on a Sausalito ferry boat, extended the hand of fellowship and when repulsed was almost thrown off his feet by the shock. When told why his hand was scorned he seemed at first to doubt his senses. In the discussion that followed he denied having used the offensive language. He did not even know that it had been published in his favorite journal, the Call. Mr.

Heney was not dissembling. When he denounced Judge Melvin in Oakland he was not conscious of what he was saying. I have frequently asserted that it was absolutely incredible that a man consciously would utter so many untruths in public as Mr. Heney has uttered in the last few years, and I am pleased to learn that his friends are justified in taking a charitable view of his prevarications. And now in the light of the occurrence on the Sausalito boat perhaps the suggestion will not be taken amiss that Mr. Heney be permitted to refresh his memory with reference to that memorable midnight meeting.

A String-Tied Challenge

But let us hark back to the subject of Mr. Heney's challenge for the purpose of treating it seriously. Aside from the circumstance that Mr. Hearst would be at a disadvantage in debating a question of fact with a man of Mr. Heney's peculiar resourcefulness, the challenge should be demurred to on the ground that it is ambiguous. Does Mr. Heney desire to confine the debate strictly to the graft which he is prosecuting or is he willing to include the alleged graft involved in his fee from the Contra Costa Water Company? He says that he will debate with Mr. Hearst "upon questions and issues relating to or connected with the graft prosecutions"; will Mr. Heney admit the Contra Costa fee as germane to the subject of debate? Mr. Hearst, in justice to himself, were he to accept the challenge, should demand a more specific bill of particulars. The challenge is too general. Moreover, it is permissible for Mr. Hearst to decline Mr. Heney's challenge on the ground that a debate on the "questions and issues relating to or connected with the graft prosecution" would be thrashing over old straw. Mr. Heney has had ample opportunity to "debate" these questions and issues not only with Mr. Hearst and his Examiner but with the bulk of the press of California who have been clamorously demanding Mr. Heney's reason for failure to successfully prosecute those whom he accuses of high crimes and misdemeanors. What's the use of buffeting words with Mr. Hearst on this outworn subject when everybody knows that Mr. Heney has said all that he has to say in his own defense and the defense of those whom he is serving? Does Mr. Heney want to say it all over and call it a "debate"? Perhaps that is Mr. Heney's intention, but the rest of us are heartily tired of the Heney method of explaining the graft prosecution. We were hoping that these "questions and issues" were to be swallowed, temporarily at least, in a war in the Balkans; but seemingly we have been disappointed; and we must endure our perennial affliction as long as Mr. Heney's breath and Mr. Spreckels's money hold out to burn.

Was It a Libel?

Another section of Mr. Heney's challenge to Mr. Hearst offers a libel suit against Mr. Hearst if he will "get from behind the corporation ownership and assume personal responsibility for the libelous articles published in the Examiner against him (Heney) during the past year." There is no ambiguity in this threat. It is clear that in this section of his double-headed challenge Mr. Heney is thinking seriously of the accusation that his fee from the Contra Costa Water Company was out of all proportion to any legitimate service he could have rendered to the corporation—this is the specially "libelous article" for which Mr. Heney would like to have Mr. Hearst assume responsibility. Mr. Hearst ought to gratify Mr. Heney in this regard. He cannot, of course, assume "personal responsibility" for the article, because he did not write it or cause it to be written; but he can appear in any court as the responsible publisher of the Examiner and bear with commendable fortitude any denial by Mr. Heney that he was paid more than he was worth for his service (whatever that service may have been) to the Contra Costa Water Company; a service more valuable (as he would probably show) than any rendered by John Garber and Garrett McEnerny, whose fees were infinitesimal in comparison with the Heney reward, remuneration or whatever euphonious name he may give it. In this connection I have another suggestion to make: if Mr. Heney wishes to punish Hearst and vindicate himself why not sue the Prophet of the Indepence League for slander? Mr. Hearst, from a public platform, made this announcement: "Mr. Heney would probably like to meet any respectable man, but no respectable man wants to meet Mr. Heney." Furthermore Mr. Hearst asserted that Mr. Heney "belonged not on a platform but in a pillory." The law does not permit a man to assail another in this fashion with impunity. Mr. Hearst may plead that as a man need not take up any challenge flung down to him or sweep out of his way any litter of lies that may chance to encumber it, neither should he be denied the privilege of answering a challenge in the language which he deems proper. But this plea would be overruled. Mr. Hearst might, perhaps, in disdaining the challenge, have said as Macaulay says, that there is a class which is protected against response; that the skunk is protected against the hunters because it is too filthy to handle, to noisome even to approach, but Mr. Hearst indulges in no glittering generalities. He was as specific as he was emphatic. No honest judge will refuse Mr. Heney redress. The burden is on Mr. Hearst to prove that Mr. Heney belongs in a pillory and that no respectable man wants to meet him. Of course the burden is on Mr. Hearst only in the event of his being prosecuted.

Lighting Up "The Great White Way"

If all the plans now under way for the upbuilding of the old theatrical center of the town are consummated casual visitors will think that Aladdin has been practicing some of his transformations on a most magnificent scale. Thick as was strewn the old locality with sumptuous dining places, these new plans promise to eclipse them. Tait is negotiating to lease the site of the old Fischer Theatre on O'Farrell street and fit up an establishment surpassing in appointments anything ever before seen here. Zinkand plans to furnish something on an elaborate scale near the site of his famous cafe. And there are others, notably several well known French caterers. The Kreling Company has all the money in bank ready to erect in short time a big opera house on the old Tivoli site the day the city government gives notice that it no longer cares to lease that property for public offices. Manager Will Greenbaum, backed by several supporters, has just obtained terms on the big Parrott lot on the south side of Sutter street, above Powell, with a view to erecting an auditorium there capable of seating five thousand people. The purpose is to make it the home of grand opera and concerts, with smaller halls for musicians and studios for artists. At present the scheme is one that only a big corporation can safely swing. On the site of the old Lurline baths at Larkin and Bush streets a company is figuring on erecting a hippodrome patterned after the enormously successful New York enterprise. With the Orpheum, Columbia, Alcazar and other big theatres back in the old locality the Great White Way will be able to blazon a light that will be seen along the whole Pacific Coast.

A Chance Missed by Mammy Pleasant

The report that a ranch in Santa Barbara County, once owned by Mammy Pleasant and sold last May for $600,000, is now worth $4,000,000 through the discovery of rich oil fields, will come as small solace to that poor soul, Mammy Pleasant turned over her share in the place to the Bell estate. The interest on the mortgage ran into such high figures at one per cent a month that the bank virtually took everything. At one time the shrewd old negress was rated at being enormously wealthy, but several years after the close of the notorious Sharon case she was listed among those who had staked and lost everything in that savage litigation. But all her life Mammy Pleasant enjoyed the confidence and support of very influential people here. In 1902, when she was reported to have lost everything, she was living under the protection of one of the most prominent Burlingame families. The plea of poverty on Mammy Pleasant's part was taken with considerable salt by those most intimate with her ways, for they knew that in the manipulation of her various holdings she herself frequently spread such rumors in order to deceive those pursuing her through devious law processes. Sam Davis was familiar with the final settlement of her estate and he claimed it was small. What a deal of excitement the resourceful old lady would have stirred up had $4,000,000 in oil wells been discovered on that ranch in the year before her demise.

The Lowenberg Book

The Sequoia Club, I hear, will take up for discussion, next Monday night, Mrs. I. Lowenberg's novel, "The Irresistible Current," which has excited a great deal of interest and discussion on account of the author's bold preachments on the subject of religion. The women of clubdom who love philosophic discussion have found much to inspire them in this book, and in several clubs it has already been dealt with by women of critical bent. The California Club critics have not yet undertaken an analysis of the work, but they are scheduled to do so on Thursday, the 22nd inst. Meanwhile the demand for the novel shows no signs of abating. Mrs. Lowenberg has surely been very fortunate in her first performance in fiction.

THE WEEK'S FINANCIAL OUTLOOK

By R. E. Mulcahy

Politics at home and rumors of war abroad have dominated security values in all markets. During the week past the fear of European holders dumping their American securities caused a sharp decline in all Wall Street shares. The war cloud was so dark that those who were trailing along trying to follow the big show gave way to weakness and threw their commitments overboard, allowing the present market leaders an opportunity to pick up the load at bargain prices. The most conspicuous buyers were brokers who are identified with the Harriman crowd; their buying was of sufficient volume to absorb all offerings and cause an advance of some importance. It is estimated that Europe sold upwards of 400,000 shares of different high priced securities. This amount, while not being enough to threaten gold exports, was sufficient to scare the small operators. The result has proved beneficial to the market, as it has placed securities in stronger hands. It has been visible to the experienced operator that very little selling of stocks has been indulged in by the large operators. It is also noticeable how their efforts are directed on the buying side upon every fair decline. We are about two weeks away from the election; the indications are daily becoming more apparent that there is but one candidate in the field. Taft will surely be elected, which means good times and high prices for all securities. The Republicans have a good deal to thank Mr. Hearst for, as he has made Bryan look like a loser from the day he opened his guns on the Nebraskan. Now that the political bugbear is practically out of the way the only unsettling condition will be the war cloud abroad; however, should a general conflict take place what argument is there to put forth that would depress American securities; would it not have a beneficial effect. It would seem so. Any trouble abroad would result in foreign money finding investment in a country where peace prevails. Our farm products would be eagerly sought after. This would turn the tide of money in our direction. Cheap money means advancing prices for stocks and bonds, and general prosperity. Money is always restless and must be continually employed. It is quite noticeable at the present time how railway earnings are gradually returning to their normal condition. We hear very little of idle cars and engines, but we are hearing of congestion of traffic. The Southern Pacific, and in fact, the Harriman lines, have no cars in "cold storage." Every wheel is moving, in other word, in actual service. They have a few idle engines; this is not because they are not needed, it is because they require a few fresh engines to meet emergencies, thereby crowding those in actual service. With the immense crops gathered this year it will take wise transportation men to move the tonnage; the traffic departments will be able to handle them. With such conditions prevailing, the railway conditions from a financial standpoint are most favorable. Security values appear to some as being high; this idea comes from the thoughtless. Securities of our transportation properties must be figured as you would real estate; the country through which they traverse is continually improving, the property gains intrinsic value just as a piece of real estate does. It is one and the same thing as regards gaining values. At present, Southern Pacific common is paying six per cent and it is pretty certain it will continue to do so, with the chances very much in favor of an increase in the near future; at 120 it would pay about five per cent, a very good investment considering the cheapness of money. There is not a railway system in this country with such a bright future as the Southern Pacific has. It was not so many years ago when the Middle West was practically where the Pacific Coast is today. Is there any reason why the present conditions out here should not equal those of that part of the United States as they are today. The foundations to build up from west of the Rockies not only equal those of the Middle West, but surpasses them. We will soon hear of many new undertakings in the transportation line which will start the wheels of progress, and make California a country equaled by none. To my way of thinking we are on the verge of one of the greatest upward movements ever seen in the security markets of this country. On January 1st over two hundred million dollars will be paid out for dividends in New York and Boston alone. This money must and will seek investment through the channel of Wall Street. Local conditions continue to show improvement.

Cupid Exceeds the Speed Limit

The engagement of Miss Geraldine Bagg and Mr. Kernan Robeson might be cited as evidence that the speed limit is no longer imposed on Cupid. Their wedding is to date just six weeks from their first meeting, which was providentially brought about. Mr. Paschal and Mr. Lucas, who have set up their bachelor Penates in Sausalito, asked Miss Maye Colburn and Mrs. Charles Mason to test their culinary powers at a little dinner party. Miss Colburn suggested that she bring along a friend, in the handsome person of Miss Bagg, and the motion was promptly put through, with Mrs. Charles Mason acting as chaperone. During the course of the dinner Mr. Robeson unexpectedly came, saw, and was conquered. It was evident to every one present that Miss Bagg had bagged another ardent admirer, even at the cost of a pun. Mr. Robeson has been named as the most promising suitor for the hand of a charming grass widow, who recently married, but he evidently did not propose to carry any stock in the syndicate of ex-admirers when here was an opportunity to enjoy the pleasure of a live interest. He suggested a ride after dinner to his own bungalow at Waldo Point, and by the time the young ladies returned with Mrs. Mason to their homes in San Rafael the courtship had passed the foreword and had finished Chapter I. The next day Miss Bagg left for Tahoe, but Mr. Robeson sent her frequent and lengthy telegrams in French and shortly after she returned he went around with a proprietary smile which argued that his suit was favorable, and prepared everyone for the announcement.

Mrs. Grundy Wide Awake

The de Young girls have established a family record of two prospective weddings, but there are those who say that the Newhall sisters will soon go them one better, for in spite of the vogue of small sleeves they are said to have three engagement announcements tucked under their snug cuffs. From the persistency with which Mr. Gale Anderton, Mr. Sydney Brock and Mr. Armsby call, and the orchids that follow in their wake, it is not surprising that Mrs. Grundy slyly pinches the fluting in her guessing cap and does not question whether it is on straight.

A Trick of the Trade

The San Rafael tradespeople are a canny sort, judging from the ruse practiced by one of them not long ago, to wring money out of a careless customer. As the lady in question always maintains a dignified financial poise, the sommersaults turned by the tradesmen seems ridiculous. The bill was overdue only through an oversight, but the tradespeople have had such a difficult time getting money from fashionable people that they do not weigh fine distinctions. So this particular merchant sent a package to the lady at her summer home near Healdsburg and carefully refrained from writing the sender's name on the outside. When a notice from the nearest Wells Fargo office informed the lady that a package with $23 charges was awaiting her pleasure, she took counsel with her maid as to the probable contents of the parcel. The maid finally set forth the ten miles to the express office with instructions to wheedle the agent into letting her see what the package contained before paying the charges. The agent had an impressionable spot, and contrary to precedent, the maid opened the bundle, which had as many wrappings as an ear of corn and was freighted with all manner of useless fillers, but at the bottom reposed a receipted bill from the San Rafael merchant for $23—the exact amount due him for goods delivered!

Has Gone East For His Bride

Mr. Osgood Putnam left last week for Boston, where his marriage to Mrs. Booern, formerly Miss Chace, will take place. Mr. Putnam has been a widower many years. His first wife was Miss Clara Van Wyck, daughter of Mrs. Sydney Van Wyck, Sr. Little Elizabeth Putnam, the dainty wee miss who attended her aunt, Mrs. A. B. Chinn upon her recent marriage, is the only child of Mr. Putnam. Mr. Putnam is expected to return to California with his bride within a few weeks.

His Misadventures With a Latchkey

A young bachelor, who has a serious business side, and yet believes that the best of life is laughter, is telling a good story on himself. The other night he was about to set forth to a stag dinner at a club when his sister, who is a talented miniature painter, remarked: "I suppose it will be an all night affair, George." Which served to remind the young man that he had mislaid his latchkey, and someone in the family promptly furnished him with a key. At 4 G. M., when the city is tucked up in a blanket of fog, the young man paid the cabman his fare, carefully ascended the steps of his Pacific avenue residence, and finally drew forth the borrowed latchkey.

The key and the hole refused to come to any sort of terms, a habit that both have at early morning hours; in fact, the word "fumble" and "key" pair off together as easily as ball and socket. However, on this occasion the key did not come honestly by its maladroitness. It was a fuzzy-wuzzy hour, but the young man might have passed the examination for a W. C. T. U. presidential candidate. He struck a match and carefully studied the key. It had dips and spurs and angles unaccustomed to that particular keyhole, and yet it was strangely familiar. It was the key to the country home at Mountain View! Not having an areoplane handy, the young man decided against making the trip to San Mateo county. He wrote a note, dated the exact hour, folded the latchkey in it, and depositing both under a doormat went stalking off into the soggy darkness to a downtown hotel. His mother and sister, meantime, having heard unusual sounds, finally decided to rouse a servant to see whether burglars were on the premises. The trail led straight to the front door, but by the time the frightened band of amateur gumshoe artists reached the mat the young man had disappeared and only the note and the key remained to tell the story of his adventure.

Artist and Broker Wed

Mrs. Donald Monroe, who was Miss Laura Foster up to two weeks ago, has written her friends in this city that she is now settled in a charming apartment and is going on with her illustrating work for the Gotham papers as before her marriage with the New York stock broker. They did not go upon a honeymoon trip. Quite a few of their friends saw them married at the Little Church Around the Corner. The bride wore a brown cloth traveling suit, with hat to match, which was exceedingly becoming. Mr. Monroe is about fifty years of age and is comfortably well off, so that his bride does not need to bother about pot-boiling work for the future, but can work for art's sake alone.

The Lehr of Belvedere

Belvedere, beloved haunt of Bohemia's night owls, has its Harry Lehr in "Binky" McKinnon, club man, dilletante, bon vivant and good fellow, for years the most popular summer beau of the Corinthian village. Somebody was saying the other day what a resemblance there was between the Newport pet and him of Belvedere, and a witty woman retorted: "Oh, but 'Binky' doesn't sell champagne—he sells whisky."

She Wanted to Know

Of late Belvedere has gone in for the horsey, doggy pose a la Burlingame, where the smart people are all versed in kennel and stable lore. One of the most aristocratic of the village dwellers, a pretty and refined young widow, thought she must do the proper thing so she set up a kennel not long ago. In conversation with Billy Leavitt, the insurance man, she referred to her new fad, and in a manner that was a very good imitation of that of Burlingame, she asked:

"Now, Mr. Leavitt, supposing I matched a Gordon setter with an Irish setter, what would result?"

Bill was so taken by surprise that he replied without thinking, but with a perceptible stammer:

"Why—why—some little setters, I suppose."

Passing Under the Wedding Bells

Very elaborate was the wedding of Miss Margaret Evans James, second daughter of Mrs. Nathaniel James, to Hartwell Craigen MacCartney, on the evening of October 14th, at the residence of Mrs. H. B. Underhill, Jr. The bride is a striking looking girl of rare coloring and a wealth of auburn hair and looked a picture in her handsome wedding robe and long tulle veil. Soft yellow was the prevailing tone; that color flushed the walls, the lights, the decorations and the gowns of the attendants. Mrs. J. B. Chace, formerly Clara Underhill, was matron of honor, and wore an elaborate robe of the deepest cream, while Miss Pansy Perkins, the maid of honor, wore a handsome dress of the same shade. The two attractive sisters of the bride the Misses Gladys and Cornelia James, were in dresses of deep yellow, making a most artistic effect. Mr. J. B. Chace was the best man. Mr. and Mrs. MacCartney will reside in Washington, where Mr. MacCartney is prominent in the law.

The New Afternoon Tea at the Fairmont

One of the largest tea parties ever held in San Francisco took place on Thursday, October 15th, when Colonel Kirkpatrick inaugurated the serving of afternoon tea in the beautiful Laurel Court of the Fairmont Hotel. It took one back to the days of the old Palace and the Palm Garden to see the assembly of handsomely gowned women. Everybody was there. The dainty little announcement cards which the hotel management sent out brought just such a company as one would expect to see at a fashionable gathering. The "afternoon tea" has come to be one of the features of modern metropolitan hotel life. And the service which has been introduced at the Fairmont leaves nothing to be desired. The Laurel Court is a most inviting place at all times and it took on an added fascination with the presence of so many women—the soft strains of music—the rustle of silks—and the hum of conversation. This new social feature comes as a welcome innovation and has apparently found a welcome place in the life of the ladies of this city.

A New Creme de la Creme

And so Los Angeles is to have an exclusive 150—not a "400"; no a "150"; a sort of cactus aristocracy, so to speak. It is the proper caper for so wonderful a city; and the twenty-five ladies who selected themselves for censors should be the recipients of the city's thanks, conveyed to them by Mayor Harper and Deputy Woolwine, with brass mountings. These twenty-five censors, who are to pick the 150, and who ruled out the wife of a lieutenant-general of the army, retired, the wife of an ex-Confederate belonging to one of the old families of Virginia, the widow of a paymaster-general of the navy, and a hundred odd other brilliant, handsome, educated, are deserving of congratulations. But, instead, I am told by a correspondent, they have provoked nothing but cynical comment and coarse derision. The knockers are rampant with their little hammers. They are calling attention to the fact that there isn't blue blood enough in the bunch to fill a thimble; that there is only one with lineage of high degree; that several of them worked for a living before their marriage, etc., etc. These are the twenty-five: Mrs. A. C. Balch, Mrs. Hancock Banning, Mrs. Walter Jarvis Barlow, Mrs. Roland Bishop, Mrs. E. A. Bryant, Mrs. Guy Cochran, Mrs. Michael J. Connell, Mrs. George J. Denis, Mrs. J. C. Drake, Mrs. W. E. Dunn, Mrs. William May Garland, Mrs. Burton Green, Mrs. Frank Hicks, Mrs. Howard E. Huntington, Mrs. Mary Longstreet, Mrs. Randolph H. Miner, Mrs. Dan MacFarland, Mrs. Granville MacGowan, Mrs. Hugh Macneil, Mrs. Walter Newhall, Mrs. Henry O.Melveny, Mrs. George Patton, Mrs. Milo M. Potter, Mrs. Alfred Solano and Mrs. I. N. Van Nuys.

A Smart Set Indispensible

Here is what a prominent member of the committee of twenty-five mentioned above thinks of the function of a smart set: "Such a set is a social necessity even in Los Angeles. You cannot throw open the doors of every man's house to every other man's family. If that were done there would be no society. People of congenial tastes and temperaments get together, and involuntarily form a clique or set. They invite each other to each other's houses, give entertainments for mutual enjoyment, and amuse themselves and live in a way to suit their particular inclinations. This is all that the 'smart set' does, here as elsewhere, and there are innumerable other sets which do the same thing. The 'smart set' is exclusive because the members are satisfied with each other, and they do not seek the privilege of moving in the other circles. There should be no prejudice against the 'smart set.' Its existence is as natural as it is necessary."

The Mecca of Motor Parties

My correspondent from Del Monte writes that the weather for the past week has been simply glorious—calm, balmy, with just a touch of fall in the air. October at Del Monte really is one of the finest months of the year and many San Franciscans appreciate it. The Hotel continues to be an objective for many motor parties who run down for the week-end. The performance of "As You Like It" given by the Monterey Civic Club on Saturday last brought down a good many. It was undoubtedly the finest thing in amateur theatricals ever given in California and was warmly received. The success of "As You Like It" means that probably next summer on the height of the gay season a similar performance will be given. Among the jolly parties who motored down from San Francisco to enjoy the outdoor theatricals was one chaperoned by Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Booth. It included Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Gresen, Miss Lydia Gibbons and Walter Scribner.

Social Festivities in Berkeley

The Hotel Carlton in Berkeley has been the scene of a number of delightful social affairs during the past week, one of the most charming of these being the dinner last Friday evening at which Captain John T. Nance, U. S. A., entertained in honor of Captain and Mrs. Edward M. Lewis. The dinner was served in the private dining room of the hotel and the large round table at which the guests were seated was effectively decorated with coreopsis, violets and maiden-hair ferns. Captain Nance's guests included besides Captain and Mrs. Lewis, General and Mrs. Woodruff, President and Mrs. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, Captain and Mrs. H. H. Stout, and Mr. and Mrs. Miller. Captain Lewis has been stationed for the past year at the Presidio of Monterey and has come to Berkeley to reside. Captain Nance is Professor of Military Science and Tactics at the University of California. Another affair of more than ordinary interest given at this popular Berkeley hostelry was the banquet of the Unitarian Club, which was enjoyed by over a hundred members. There were toasts and speeches and much merriment on this occasion. Professor William Carey Jones, the president of the club, was the toastmaster and Professor F. F. Bunker, superintendent of schools in Berkeley, the principal speaker of the evening. His topic was "The Making of Men and Women From Our Boys and Girls." Thursday evening Mrs. and J. S. Mackenzie, who is a guest at the hotel, entertained at dinner, Mr. and Mrs. John Neville and their son, and on Sunday Mr. Henry P. Redington had as his guests Mrs. Charles

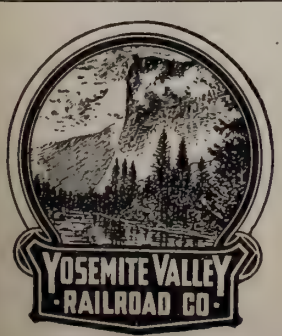
Mrs. Ronalds on English Society



Mrs. Ronalds, who is called the American Ambassadress to the Court of St. James and who is supposed to be the most influential American woman in London society, has just returned to New York on her first visit in twenty years. Mrs. Ronalds lives abroad permanently now. Her home in Cadogan place is a favored spot of London's smartest set. The King and Queen are often entertained there informally and for an American to be invited there is to be received into the holy of holies in British society. Americans visiting London, who have letters to Mrs. Ronalds, find everything open to them. Occupying this exceptional position Mrs. Ronalds is highly qualified to speak of English society. "One must live in England," she said, recently, "to understand and appreciate it. I doubt if there exists anywhere in the world such a complete society as we have in London. His Majesty, the King, is its head, together with the Queen. The lines are not at all clearly defined. Anybody is welcome who should be welcome. Money is not the entrance key. One must be interesting, be clever, be likeable. The lines are not drawn so hard and fast as they seem to be in New York. A musician, a writer, an artist, an actor, a traveller is just as welcome in London as an earl or a baron. English country life, as far as I can judge, is the perfection of existence. English people take life more calmly than Americans. Never let anyone say that the English are not hospitable. To be sure, one must have letters to them and must be properly introduced, but once an Englishman invites you to his home you may rest assured that everything will be done to enhance your comfort and happiness."

Ethel Barrymore Denies the Interview

Ethel Barrymore has written a letter warmly denying the recent sensational interview so widely attributed to her in the daily press regarding her alleged sharp strictures on the American society woman. The original interview came out in a St. Louis paper and made Miss Barrymore say that society women, especially the New York type, were "brainless and senseless." American girls ambitious to marry foreign noblemen were unmercifully scored. Miss Barrymore says that in her interview with the young lady representing the St. Louis paper the subject of American society women was not even broached. She herself was horrified to read the interview and set about promptly to correct its evil intent. Her management has taken up the matter.

Martial Mishaps of a Countess

The reecnt death of the ill-starred Mabel, Countess Russell, recalls the extraordinary matrimonial history of her family. Her father, Sir Claude Scott, who belonged to a wealthy old banking firm, after several years of married life eloped with Lady Albert Clinton, a young and beautiful girl. Sir Claude died soon afterward in Paris, leaving $100,000 a year to his two daughters, Lena and Mabel Scott. A great part of their fortune went in litigation, however, and Lena, when in her teens, secretly married a well-known clubman named Edgar Sebright. In a couple of years Mrs. Sebright brought suit to have the marriage annulled on the ground that she married under duress, that she parted from her husband at the door of the registry office and that the marriage had never been consummated. The suit became a cause celebre and ended in the marriage being declared null and void. Next she married an importer, who was masquerading as a Prince. He abused her and she got a divorce. Mabel married Earl Russell in 1890 but within a few months they were in the divorce court. The evidence disclosed that the Earl was really in love with the mother and married the daughter, whom he hated, solely at the mother's instigation. The Countess went on the stage in musical comedy and the Earl came to America, got his divorce and married Mrs. Sommerville.

The First Cat Show Scores a Success

Del Monte has been the scene of many notable affairs, from receptions to Presidents down to automobile races and dog shows. But no such show as the one now going on has been held there. Before the fire the San Francisco Cat Club held annual exhibitions which aroused much interest, but none have been held recently. The Del Monte Cat Club is a member of the American Cat Association and is making a big effort to stimulate interest in these pets. From the indications of the entry list and the first arrivals there is no question that it will be decidedly successful. The ordinary tabby appears in a new light when we see cats valued at $300, $450, $700 and some up as high as $3000 each. There were more than one hundred entries on Saturday last, and by special request the entry list which was to close October 10th was held open until October 14th. Besides the trophies and medals offered by the Del Monte Cat Club many handsome premiums have been hung up by the hotel and a number of individuals. The judging will be done by Mrs. Lela Norton of Los Angeles, an authority on cats. It will take place Friday and Saturday afternoon. Special attention has been given to the care of the animals received.

Odd Things in the World

Tricks in Selling Relics

The unwary visitor to the battlefield of Waterloo, if he be a collector of mementos, runs great risk of falling into the traps laid for him by the wily traffickers in spurious relics. Many of their tricks are well known, but the Paris Gaulois tells one that may be new to most curio hunters. It has discovered a happy miller's family living in the vicinity of the battlefield who have derived a regular income since 1815 from the sale of a rusty iron nail. It was not many years after the battle that an eccentric Englishman on the strength of an eyewitness's evidence discovered that Napoleon's hat had been hanging on that nail, the Emperor having rested a while at the mill during the battle. An offer for the old nail was immediately accepted by the previously guileless miller, who after the deal replaced it by another old nail and painted an inscription round it on the wall pointing out its historical value. One nail after another has gone to enrich collections as priceless Napoleonic relics. How many times the nail has been changed the Gaulois does not venture to estimate.

Nail Broken Bones Together

The latest medico-surgical discovery, announced from Paris, is the use of nails made of aluminum or magnesium, preferably magnesium, for the cure of simple fractures. For a fracture of the shin bone or the thigh bone, the nails are driven in to hold the two pieces of bone together much like two pieces of wood. Some time ago nails of ivory and bone were used, but it has been found that the aluminum and magnesium nails are absorbed by the system soon after they have done the work required of them. It is believed that the nailing of broken ends is the quickest way to repair a fracture, and it does away with the old system under which a patient had to keep in bed for three weeks with his foot attached to a fifty pound weight.

Started a Haunted House

Hull is rejoicing in a haunted house. It appears that on Friday last the brother-in-law of James Gilson, the tenant, was buried, and after the fatigues of the wake and the funeral the Gilsons retired to well earned rest. Gilson and another brother-in-law, O'Grady, were sleeping together and they were awakened about 3 A. M. by a low tapping. They believed that the sound came from their wives, who were in a lower room, but on investigation they found the women sitting on the bed in a state of great alarm. "Then," says O'Grady, "pots and pans flew across the room, and the end of it was that we all ran into the street." The screams of the women roused the whole neighborhood, and detachments of men gathered enough courage to go in couples to examine the house. They all came out horror stricken, declaring that ornaments were falling off the walls and mantlepieces and that pots and pans were careering around as if alive. At last the constables arrived on the scene. It happened that the policeman on the post was that same Constable Kelly who at the Olympic games won the championship among the heavyweight wrestlers. He came out from the house puzzled and willing to admit that there was something going on that he could not wrestle with. A teacup hit him in the face, he says, and a pebble came flying through the back door. The Gilsons and O'Gradys took refuge with their neighbors and are now looking for new quarters, as nothing would tempt them to stay in the haunted house. Mrs. Gilson is inclined to blame her dead brother for all the confusion, as she says they were not annoyed until his death. The police force are skeptical in regard to the supernatural and are keeping a constant watch on the house.

Some Observations On Jones

All the critics who have seen "The Hypocrites" at the Alcazar agree that it is a fine, strong play, that the performance is most praiseworthy and that the new leading lady is deserving of warm eulogy. I was quite sure that the critics would enjoy the Jones play; especially the critics that enthused over the Belasco play of the preceding week, for anyone so happily ingenuous, so wholesomely receptive toward stage illusions as to be susceptible to the appeal of "A Grand Army Man" is bound to yield his emotions to the masterly touch of Henry Arthur Jones. A critic can always laugh conscientiously at a Jones witticism, and despise heartily any of his hypocrites, and sympathize sincerely with all of the numerous married ladies he has given us, who, through curiosity, were led to the verge of infidelity and the brink of scandal. Jones is my favorite playwright. Few living dramatists have been so unerring of aim, so uniformly successful both from the commercial and artistic standpoint as the author of "The Hypocrites." And yet, singularly enough, Jones has not attained the prestige in this country that is enjoyed by some of his countrymen who have at times proved very poor judges of their own work; who have fallen far below Jones at his feeblest and who have never risen above him at his best. Why there should be more magic in the name of Pinero than in the name of Jones I am unable to conceive. Surely Jones never turned out anything quite so bad as "A Wife Without a Smile," and surely Pinero never wrote anything better than "Judah" or "The Crusaders." As for Shaw, Jones has beaten the idol of the high-brows at his own game. Shaw is nothing if not didactic, and he is often that and nothing more, whilst Jones is nearly always both didactic and delightful. Shaw is greatly admired for his ability as a writer of prefaces. So is Jones. And I think I prefer Jones, though unlike Shaw he never makes his preface more brilliant than his play. Nor does he ever, like Shaw, employ the dramatic form merely as a vehicle for a sermon. In his preface to "The Triumph of the Philistines" Jones wrote: "In my strenuous endeavor to enforce a moral I fear I did not take care to write a good play. But thus it happens when a moral purpose is allowed to get the upper hand in a work of art." It did not happen, however, in "The Triumph of the Philistines." It has not happened in any of Jones's plays, and yet Jones has never failed to inculcate a moral lesson. He is distinctly a stage preacher, but his plays may be appreciated for their truth to life as well as for their intellectual idea. And they also may be appreciated for their technique which is as notable for its thumb-touch delicacy as Pinero's. Jones always contrives his stage expedients with a true eye to illusion, he never introduces twaddle, and he always treats his audience as respectfully as he would treat his friends. In short there are few men who can so cleverly tell a story on the stage through a cumulative succession of plausible incidents. And yet, I say, Henry Arthur Jones has not attained the vogue either of Shaw or Pinero. No Chautauqua lecturer ever mentions Jones. I have never heard of Jones being studied by a student of the drama. It cannot be that it is because he is not regarded as a "literary man," for he is unquestionably an artist in letters. A distinguished French critic, M. Filon, has said of him that he has played a great part in "the resuscitation of the drama," and that he is "the most English of all living English dramatists; the one who expresses most sincerely and most brilliantly the mind of his generation and of his race." It is of record that so cultured a critic as Matthew Arnold congratulated Jones on having given Philistinism one of the hardest blows it had ever received. Mr. Arnold alluded to the satirical smash in "Saints and Sinners." Jones, by the way, has been smashing Philistines and hypocrites all his life. He has written a series of plays attacking the hypocrisies of religion, and in his preface to "The Case of Rebellious Susan" he tells us that the theatre is destined to succeed to the tottering pulpit and to teach morality to the professional moralist. Reformers he ranks with hypocritical religious bigots, and once he told the people of London something that it might be well for us of San Francisco to ponder,—that to reform London it was necessary for each Englishman to reform himself. At another time he wrote in a preface: "Looking round upon my countrymen, upon their smug and banal ideas, their smug and banal ways of living, their smug and banal terror of art, their smug and banal haste to make the best of both worlds, I concluded that the most necessary moral to drive home to Englishmen today is the wholesome one contained in a verse of Ecclesiastes: 'Be not righteous overmuch; why shouldst thou destroy thyself?'" Perhaps it is because of the sentiments, scornful of hypocrisy, that imbue all Henry Arthur Jones's work that I so highly esteem his plays. These observations on the English dramatist I offer in lieu of impressions of the performance at the Alcazar which I have been unable to attend.

Dustin Farnum in "The Squaw Man"

After seeing "The Squaw Man," "The Girl of the Golden West," "The Great Divide," and other plays of that ilk the ordinary theatregoer cannot help being impressed with the great fruitfulness of the West as a field for dramatic and literary exploitation. A shrewd critic, after spending a year's outing in Alaska, remarked on his return that that territory had not even been touched yet by writers; that a true story depicting Alaskan life had not yet been written. In a way almost the same thing may be said of California. Bret Harte was picturesque and—Bret Harte. "Ramona" touched a chord But the stuff of merit is yet to come. "The Squaw Man" is one of the many attempts to give an adequate picture of western life. It was unfortunate in its origin and was stretched badly when Playwright Royle enlarged it from a successful playlet into a four-act money-maker for the road. That stretching is responsible for the extraneous first act where for contrast he has streaked one corner of his picture with a sketch of aristocratic English society. Dustin Farnum, with his rolling walk and awkward movements, does not shine at his best in his smart officer's dress there. Among Farnum's ardent admirers his romantic success in "The Virginian" branded him an ideal cowboy, and an ideal cowboy in chaps and loose neckerchief he will always be to them. As a picture of western life in melodramatic form "The Squaw Man" has distinction over most of its competitors because it presents a unique phase of American life. The "squaw man" was a white adventurer, who for reasons of his own, married an Indian woman. Western plainsmen generally regarded this as a social downfall and looked upon the offender as a "low-down scrub," and in most instances he was. In singular contrast, across the Canadian line in the British possessions a union of this kind went unnoticed. Some of the highest factors in the employ of the Hudson Bay Company, men who cut notable figures in its western affairs, married squaws and their children were accorded the usual custom and esteem. This sentiment regarding the color line is one of the interesting anomalies distinguishing society in Europe and in America. It is the American conception of this line that enables Playwright Royle to make use of some very strong stage material; the social sacrifice on the man's part by marrying the squaw for having saved his life and the squaw's sacrifice of her own life in order to restore her husband and little son to the world they loved. The sacrifice on the part of the man affords several interesting tableaux of western cowboy life, culminating in the shooting of the typical "bad man" by the Indian girl in order to save the life of the hero, all these incidents are vivid and replete with action, but their selection, order and form of presentation are questions of fine judgment. In this connection it is interesting to note the different ways in which Belasco, Moody and Royle handle the same material. The second sacrifice, that of the squaw, forms the pulsating climax of the play, rouses the deep sympathies, grips the feelings and compels all the finer shades of intense acting developed in the production. The Indian wife, silent, stoical and devoted, is possessed of only two ideas: "her man and her little boy." Her's is a speechless adoration. The little son is a lay figure and all the acting developed by the approaching separation of the family devolves on Farnum. Throughout he is simple, manly, natural and sympathetic, and, in the tenser passages where he declines his English home and prepares to send his little son back to England to be educated as an earl, he handles the deeper emotions with fine restraint. His pathos is convincing and moves his audience, the test of an actor's efforts. The Indian wife, as depicted by Katherine Fisher, fitted silently and effectively into her niche. It is a role demanding deep shades of facial expression, a pathetic part at the best, with an inevitable end in the hands of Playwright Royle. Mary Conwell has the somewhat trying part of an English beauty who has followed her heart to the western frontier. Little of the action falls to her lot except to look captivating, ladylike and patient while the drama carries her regularly and in decorous fashion into the arms of her lover. Most colorful and most effective of all in giving the typical western character to the play are the Ute Indian chief and his interpreter. There is no trace of staginess about them. Mitchell Lewis and Logan Paul enacted the parts and not only looked like Indians but voiced them with such strong personality as to make them stand out prominently. The robust cowboys, rustlers, deputy sheriffs, and greenhorns dotting the landscape are of the usual highly decorative brand and splash the production with live daubs of color.

Blanche Bates' New Play

Blanche Bates is said to rise to fine emotional heights in her new play "The Fighting Hope," just produced in New York. Power of purpose and determination, material devotion, great womanly sweetness, and an ultimate abandonment of overmastering hysteria are elements in the fabric of the role, and these Miss Bates embodies with complete success. The story of the play runs as follows: Anna Granger, the wife of a man who is serving a ten-year sentence in Ossining Prison for fraudulent proceedings as cashier of the Gotham Trust Company, has come, under an alias, into the home of Burton Temple, president of the company, ostensibly to serve as his stenographer, but in reality to ferret out the truth about her employer, whom she believes to be the real culprit. She has the advantage of public opinion in the matter, for Temple is a rich man and there is a general suspicion that the cashier has been railroaded to prison in order to keep the real facts from leaking out. The strength of the situation, despite the obviousness of relationships as they develop, lies in the fact that Anna, at the moment that she has saved her husband, discovers that he is in reality guilty of the crime as charged. As she has destroyed the one piece of evidence in the case it is now apparent that Temple, the financier, must go to jail. Now, as Anna by this time realizes, in a measure, the general worthlessness of her husband and has grown to love Mr. Temple very positively, a nice mental conflict is aroused. To further enhance the value of the situation, the husband appears, proves himself an unmitigated scoundrel, and so destroys the wife's last vestige of respect. In spite of the fact that Anna's growing interest in the man she has come to betray is steadily in evidence —is, in fact, the conventional and expected development of this type of play—the situation is not without the strength which develops from a natural emotional experience. It lays hold of the imagination, fixes the attention, and arouses sympathy.

Sparkling Musical Comedy at the American

"A Knight for a Day," the latest New York musical success, will follow "The Royal Chef" at the American Theatre. The first performance will be given at the next Sunday matinee, October 18th. Bobby Baving, the original Johnny Jones on the Pacific Coast, will play the leading role, supported by a cast of sixty people. No pains have been spared by the management to make this production the handsomest and best of its kind ever given here.

"Graustark" at the Valencia Theatre

"Graustark," the famous romance by George Barr McCutcheon, dramatized by Miss Grace Hayward, will be presented at the Valencia Theatre next week, beginning the Sunday matinee on October 18th. This celebrated story was for a long time one of the "best sellers," and the love romance of the young queen of a small European kingdom, with an adventurous American whom she met while traveling incog in the United States, has made many a romantic heart beat quicker. There is much that suggests "The Prisoner of Zenda" in the atmosphere of "Graustark." A breezy young American chap and his best friend are plunged into the vortex of European diplomacy and state intrigue, and not only manage to save the young Queen Yetive of Graustark from a gang of rascally scoundrels, but the American chap wins the hand of the Queen in the bargain. Of course the whole affair is delightfully impossible, but it makes an entertaining story and a thrilling play. Miss Willette Kershaw will have the role of the young Queen of Graustark, and Robert Warwick will be the adventurous American. The play will be handsomely staged, the scene in the throne room of Graustark being especially elaborate, with many rich and beautiful costumes.

"Salomy Jane" at the Alcazar

Paul Armstrong's dramatization of Bret Harte's story of the Sierras, "Salomy Jane," is to be the Alcazar's offering next week, commencing Monday evening, with Evelyn Vaughan in the title part. Of the many attempts to get the aroma of Harte's sketches over the footlights, none has been so successful as this one. The play is adroitly constructed, crisply written, vivacious, engaging and Salomy Jane ranks among the most fascinating creatures ever presented on the stage. Her bravery, resourcefuness, independence, originality, her gentleness with children, and her swift up-blazing passion when her womanly honor is questioned, render her truly a poetic figure. In the hands of such a thorough artist as Miss Vaughan this Harte heroine will surely be a characterization of very high order. Then we will have Bertram Lytell as the unnamed hero, Will Walling as Jack Marbury, the gambler; Howard Hickman as Colonel Starbottle, the lawyer-politician; Burt Wesner as Yuba Bill, and the other Alcazar favorites in well fitting roles. Three clever children have been engaged to sustain the juvenile parts, which are by no means inconsequential. Real redwood trees and genuine chapparal will make the first act setting. This production of "Salomy Jane" will surely pack the Alcazar.

The Lloyd Scott Travel-Talks

The subject for the school children's matinee of the Lloyd Scott Travel-Talks this Saturday afternoon at Christian Science Hall will be "Egypt," with over one hundred and fifty of the most beautiful colored views, moving panoramas and motion pictures. These Scott views are unquestionably the most beautiful ever exhibited in this city. Friday and Saturday night will be devoted to "Ireland," the slides for which were painted in oil by a member of the Royal Art Academy of Dublin. Next week Mr. Scott appears in Oakland at Maple Hall, on Monday night, Wednesday night and Friday he gives "India," "Japan" and "Russia," completing the course of five the following week with "Egypt" and "Ireland." The Oakland box office is at Sherman, Clay & Co's, Broadway and Thirteenth.

Beatrice Fine-Anna Miller Wood Concert

A concert of quite different character from the Arral event but one equally as beautiful and important, will be the "Evening of Song" by Beatrice Priest Fine, soprano, and Anna Miller Wood, contralto, at Christian Science Hall next Thursday evening, October 22nd. Both of these artists are native daughters; both have made splendid reputations in the East, Mrs. Fine in New York and Miss Wood in Boston; both have been out here visiting their people and both return East immediately after this concert. The program contains no less than a dozen novelties and one of them is the "Mimi Pinzon" from Leoncovallo's "La Boheme." This will be specially interesting to us San Franciscans who know our Pucini by heart. Here is the exceptionally interesting and novel progrm:

Duet, "Passage-bird's Farewell," Hildach; Aria, "Pleurez, mes Yeux" (Le Cid), Jules Massenet; "Le Sais-tu?" Jules Massenet; L'Heure d'Azur," Augusta Holmes; "In Picardie," Arthur Foote; "Pierre de Provence to Maguelone the Fair" (Mss), Edward Burlingame Hill. Miss Wood—"Let the Bright Seraphim," G. Haendel; "The Mermaid's Song," Hadyn; "Niemand hats gesehen," Carl Loewe; "Wiegenlied," W. A. Mozart; Aria, "Mimi Pinzon," (La Boheme), Leoncovallo. Mrs. Fine—"La Mer est plus belle," Mandoline," Claude Debussy; "Good Night," Anton Rubinstein; "The Enchanted Isle," Sergei Rachmaninoff; "Floods of Spring" Sergei Rachmaninoff. Miss Wood—"Like a Rosebud," Frank LaForge; "Woodland Song," Chaminade; "Boat Song," "Jay of the Morning" (words by Edwin Markham), "Sunlight" (Waltz), Harriet Ware. Mrs. Fine—Duetts (a) "Morgenroth," Tschaikowsky; (b) "It was a Lover and His Lass," Mary Carmichael.

she was unable to eat any solid food and the result is that she is still quite weak. The program she had arranged was the biggest ever attempted by any singer and rather than change one number of it and rather than disappoint the public in her work Mr. Greenbaum, at the advice of the physicians, has deemed it better to risk another postponement than to have the singer appear when not at her very best. He assures the public that Mme. Arral will be in absolutely perfect condition for Sunday afternoon, October 25th. Last Week of Ferris Hartman

Next week will be the last of Ferris Hartman's record-breaking engagement at the Princess Theatre. The program selected will be the musical farce, "The Office Boy," which abounds in pretty and catchy music and amusing lines and situations. Ferris Hartman will appear as Noah Little. Robert Litt, a particularly clever comedian, has been specially engaged to play Pythias Cheatham. The remainder of the cast is composed as follows: Damon Katcham, Arthur Cunningham; Rider Little, Walter de Leon; Tobias Van Twiller, Joseph Fogarty; Reggie Higgins, Fred W. Kavanagh; Percy Wiggins, J. Toby; McNab, Harold Abbott; Scales, Karl Formes, Jr.; Euphemia, Sybil Page; Claire de Lune, Elsie Schuler, and Paquita, Sarah Edwards. Monday, October 26th, Kolb and Dill will begin an engagement. They will be supported by a big eastern company. Their opening bill will be "Playing the Ponies."

The headline attraction for the next week at the Orpheum will be "The Operator," probably the most dramatic play ever given in vaudeville. It is acted by two sterling players, Lyster Chambers and Clara Knott. The action of "The Operator" takes place in a remote telegraph station in the middle of the Nevada desert, and the story tells of an operator who is obliged to stick to his post for seventy consecutive hours without sleep owing to an injury sustained by the night man. Worn out by fatigue he turns on the wrong switch and sends two trains along at lightening speed to meet each other. Many stirring scenes follow. Redford and Winchester, two very clever jugglers, are also included in the program, a clever and interesting feature of which will be La Petite Mignon, the remarkable little comedienne. During her engagement at the Orpheum she will mimic Marie Dressler, Eva Tanguay, George Cohan, Anna Held, Fritzi Scheff, Eddie Foy and Harry Lauder. McPhee and Hill, phenomenal aerialists, will present a novel act entitled, "The Clown and the Tired Man." Next week will be the last of Theresa Renz, in her graceful and clever equestrienne act; the Jupiter Brothers, illusionists, and Gracie Emmett & Co. in "Mrs. Murphy's Second Husband." With this bill the "Eccentric" Gennaro and his Venetian Gondolier Band, who have created a musical furore will conclude their engagement. There will also be a new series of imported Orpheum motion pictures.

Auto Notes

H. W. Lundsen of Medford, Oregon, accompanied by his family, arrived yesterday in their forty h. p. Chalmers-Detroit touring car. The travelers report the roads in fair condition in northern California, but say that north of the California line the traveling is rough and rocky. Lundsen made an easy trip, coming to this city in four days' traveling. He will leave here for San Jose, after which they expect to go to Del Monte, Santa Clara, Los Angeles and even into Mexico.

Mr. C. A. Hawkins, general manager for the White Company of the twenty-six western States, has just arrived in San Francisco from the East, and reports that the new models of the White Company are now being shipped from the factory, and the demonstrators will be in San Francisco in a few days.

The sensation of the year in automobile circles is the announcement of the White Company that their 1909 models will use California distillate as fuel, which costs six cents per gallon as against twenty-five cents for gasoline. In addition to the economy in the cost per gallon, distillate will run twenty per cent farther on a gallon than will gasoline, thus reducing the cost of automobile operation for fuel about seventy-five per cent, or one fourth the previous cost.

One of the most noticeable improvements in 1909 tires is the adoption by the Diamond Rubber Co. as their standard for 1909 of the famous Diamond Mountain Tread Type, which was originally designed for grinding the stone bruising roads of Nevada. That the tire was an absolute success is proven by the fact that fully seventy-five per cent of the business of Nevada today is done by the Diamond Rubber Company. The Mountain Tread Type is much heavier on the tread and the tread itself is brought further over on the sides as an absolute protection to the body of the tire, making a perfectly balanced automobile casing. Heretofore the perfect body of the Diamond tire has outworn the tread, necessitating one or more re-covers. This will not now be necessary as it has been found from varied experience that the Mountain Tread will give considerable more mileage, confidentially expected to go 2,000 miles more than the old type.

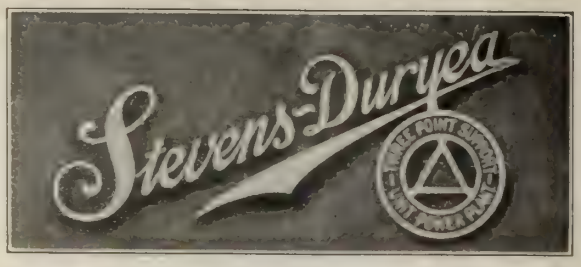
The San Francisco Gas & Electric Company took delivery this week of two Buick "White Streaks." The cars were purchased for the use of W. R. Morgan, superintendent of gas distribution, and George Worthington, superintendent of the electrical department. Mr. Morgan recently attracted considerable attention in the local automobile world by winning the cup for the best decorated car in the Olympic Club automobile parade.

The first shipment of 1909 Thomas cars will arrive Thursday. One of the famous six-cylinder 40 h. p. Thomas cars is included in the shipment.

In addition to the new burner and pilot light which are great improvements over previous models, the new White engine has only one-half the number of parts of the former engine. The crank shaft is a solid drop forging and by using only two very heavy bearings does away with any possibility of getting the bearings out of alignment. The larger White car for 1909 will be rated at forty steam horse-power and will sell for $4000. This is ten horse-power more than the White Company have heretofore put in any automobile. The machine is considered equal in performance to any gas car of twice the rated horse power. An entire new department for the White Company will be the taxicab which they will turn out for 1909 on the 20 h. p. chassis, it being especially adaptable to cities like San Francisco and Pittsburg, where the hilly nature of the streets makes the work very hard on the automobile.

Charles P. Hawke, who purchased a seven passenger White steam car last week, took himself out of the novice class on his first appearance at the wheel by making a successful tour of 360 miles. Mr. Hawke took his family in the White to Santa Cruz by way of San Juan and Watsonville, and made the return trip by Pescadero, Half Moon Bay and Redwood City. The road and grades of this tour are a good test of the skill of veteran drivers, and the fact that a novice made it without the slightest difficulty speaks volumes for the reliability of his car.

In Canada's greatest automobile race at Montreal on September 25th the Buick "White Streak" proved the sensation of the day, winning eight out of the nine events. The races took place over a half mile track and the best mile made was by the Buick in one minute and twelve seconds.



One of the most enthusiastic motorists in the State is Dr. C. F. Allen, who although well known in this city is now a resident of Napa Valley. Mr. Allen owned one of the first motor cars on the coast, and has changed cars every season. He now operates a seventy h. p. Thomas Roadster, and reports that there is nothing on wheels in his section of the State that can pass him. According to the Napa motorist, the roads in that part of the country are not all good, parts of them being cut up and rough from heavy teaming. Dr. Allen, who owns one of the finest country estates in California, says that motoring is the best sport of all.

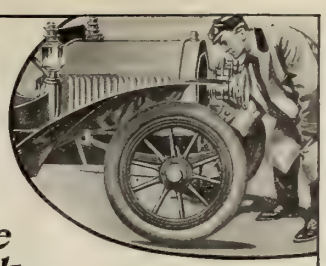
had come to him with a local mullah of Monastir to see the mission. Thinking that the Lazarist did not understand Turkish, the Stambuli fanatic, after asking a few question, turned to his colleague and said: "We shall kill this dog and plunder all these things when the time comes." The other, however, knew that the monk was a Turkish scholar, and replied: "No, no, he is a good man, and must not be harmed."

When I was at Monastir the town was full of soldiers and patrolled day and night, owing to the revolt of the Bulgarians against Turkish rule. Refugees from the neighboring villages which had been fired were not allowed to come into Monastir, and it was a long time before even the Sisters of Charity were permitted to go and collect a few of the wounded lying exposed on the mountain side. But owing to the representations of the consuls an exception was made in favor of the villagers of Smilevo and Gijavato, of whom about a hundred families were allowed to take refuge in Monastir. They were sheltered in the Bulgarian quarter and the Bulgarian school, huddled together on the floor of small rooms, almost without any furniture or belongings save what they could carry. In one class room I saw about two dozen; they formed a most picturesque group in their red and white and yellow costumes, but a pitiful sight all the same. On the walls were a map of the Holy Land, a large clock, and a portrait of the author of their woes, Abdul Hamid II. When I questioned them as to their experiences, they told their tales simply and unaffectedly—plain, unvarnished stories, all similar, but terrible in their very monotony. A quiet village, sounds of firing in the distance, enter the soldiers, the villagers fly, but are fired on as they try to get away, all who remain behind murdered, many women outraged, every house plundered, then smeared with paraffin and set on fire. And yet in spite of being in constant fear of their lives the Bulgarians were by no means cowed. The soldiers might burn down villages and murder peaceful villagers, but the komittadjis proved more difficult customers. In many an encounter the troops lost heavily, and more than one regiment refused to face the dynamite bombs of the enemy. In Monastir itself no Turk dared enter the Bulgarian quarter alone, and even when searches for arms were instituted, they were carried out in a gingerly and ineffectual fashion, for every one was convinced that there were stores of arms and bombs in many houses, and even the troops were afraid.

Next to the Bulgarians' declaration of independence the most interesting of recent developments in Europe is the annexation by Austria-Hungary of Bosnia and Herzegovina. These two provinces, formerly of the Turkish Empire, were placed under the Austrian government for administration and military occupation by the Berlin Treaty of 1878. The nationality of these provinces is mainly Servian and that is why Servia has protested against their annexation. In this connection it is interesting to reflect that Servia, too, was formerly a Turkish province, for with this reflection we remark the gradual disintegration of the power that destroyed the Byzantine Empire.



What first strikes one on entering Bosnia-Herzegovina is the sharp contrast between East and West, between the old order and the new. Austrian rule has spread a layer of Western civilization over the land, but beneath it there is a people as backward and conservative as any in the East. Our geography books may tell us that Bosnia-Herzegovina is in Europe, but the moment we cross the frontier from Dalmatia or Croatia we feel ourselves to be in another world. The natives, in fact, call any one, from the Monarchy or from other Western States, "Europeans." At Sarajevo, the capital of the occupied territory, there are modern streets, electric lights and trams, shops stocked with Vienna goods and "European" hotels. But go beyond the Franz Josef Strasse into the bazar of carsija, and you are at once in the Orient. There are wooden booths, where befezzed and beturbaned natives ply their various trades, sell embroidery, chased silver work, red slippers, gay caparisons for horses, delicious sweets, and many other strange Eastern wares. Here and there rise the graceful minarets of the mosques, whence the muezzin's weird invocation calls the faithful to prayer.

The oriental character of the country and its people is the result of over four centuries of Ottoman rule. Previously Bosnia had been, on two occasions, the nucleus of a great Servian empire, but religious dissensions made the Turkish conquest an easy task. A large proportion of the inhabitants went over to Islam, partly on account of the cruel persecutions which the Bogomile heretics had suffered and partly because the feudal nobility wished to preserve their lands and their position under the new rulers.

In all Eastern lands religion is a stronger tie than race or nationality, and Bosnia is no exception. Although all the natives belong to the Serbo-Croatian race, like those of Dalmatia, Croatia, Servia and Montenegro, religious differences have divided them into three distinct elements, hating each other with a bitter fanaticism. Each has adopted a distinct national name—the Mahommedans call themselves "Turks," the Orthodox Christians "Serbs," and the Catholics "Croatians." Austria's task in subduing and governing this unruly people has proved no light one, and order was not established until after severe fighting.

The international position of Bosnia-Herzegovina has been a very peculiar one. Though occupied by Austria-Hungary, the provinces, until last week, were nominally a part of the Sultan's dominions, but the only sign of his sovereignty was the cir-

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE ON SALE OF REAL ESTATE.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

No. 5546. Department 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of MARY ANN BUCKLEY, Deceased.

Mary A. Summerville, the Administratrix of the estate of Mary Ann Buckley, deceased, having filed her petition herein praying for an order of sale of all or a part of the real estate of said decedent, for the reasons and the purposes therein set forth, therefore it is ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased appear before the said Superior Court on Thursday, the 12th day of November, A. D. 1908, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the Courtroom of said Superior Court, Department 10 thereof, at the Grant Building, corner of Seventh and Market streets, in said City and County of San Francisco, to show cause why an order should not be granted to said Administratrix to sell so much of the real estate of said deceased, at private sale, as shall be necessary; and that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four consecutive weeks in Town Talk, a newspaper of general circulation, printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Dated San Francisco, October 7th, A. D. 1908.

THOS. F. GRAHAM,
Judge of the Superior Court.

cumstance that the foreign consuls at Sarajevo did not receive their exequation from the Austrian authorities. Otherwise all the prerogatives of government were exercised by Austria-Hungary, including the imposition of taxes and the levying of troops. For several years it has been understood that annexation was but a question of time. During all the period of the occupation the government was an absolute, if beneficial despotism.

In these provinces Austria-Hungary has experimented in colonization for the first time, and, it must be admitted, with great success. People who have blamed the Catholic church for the unprogressiveness of Spain will find it hard to account for the progress that has been made in the Balkans by a Catholic ruler. In no department is the policy of the Bosnian-Herzegovinian government more instructive than in religious matters. It has guaranteed absolute freedom of conscience and treated all religions impartially. "We are equally fanatical for all three confessions," is its watchword. At the same time it has not forgotten that religions is also a powerful instrument of political influence.

The Mahommedans, although not the most numerous, are the most influential and also the most interesting section of the population. The begs and agas and the majority of the town dwellers are Mahommedans. The former are the descendants of the old Christian feudatories who became renegades after the Turkish conquest. But they preserve their Christian escutcheons and pedigrees, and are the only Mahommedans in the world who have surnames. A curious instance of this mixtures of traditions is the present mayor of Sarajevo, Mehmed Beg Kapetanovic, who has also been created an Austrian baron. Before the occupation it was said that these begs were only waiting for the advant of a Christian government to return to the faith of their ancestors. But events have falsified the prediction, and the number of conversions since 1878 does not run into three figures. On the contrary, in no country are the followers of Islam so fanatical as to this day in Bosnia. Their manners and customs are purely Oriental, their women are closely veiled and kept in rigid seclusion, they are silent, proud, dignified and hostile to all progress. They do not, however, practice polygamy. Under the Turks they were the ruling caste, and far more powerful than the Ottoman Vizirs and Valis sent to govern them. After their resistance in 1878 had been overcome by General Filipovic a number of them emigrated to Asia Minor rather than be ruled by a Christian Power, and placed on an equal footing with the despised rayahs. The Austrians, however, did all they could to conciliate them, hoping to convert them into loyal citizens. In order to show respect to their feelings guns are fired from the forts at the hours of prayer and on certain days the authorities attend the Moslem religious festivals in full state, grants are given to build and repair mosques, arrangements are made for the Mecca pilgrimage and even the howling dervishes are sustained. In the town Mohammedans are usually appointed mayors. Special law courts have been instituted for cases relating to family matters, inheritance and religion. The industries of the countries have been promoted and are thriving under Austria's rule, and education is well cared for. Today the provinces are the one part of the Balkans with the exception perhaps of Montenegro, where there is absolute security, a decent government and progress.

"As my sole heir he was entitled to all the royalties of my works, and we agreed that he was to pay over to me three-fourths of the sums thus collected. Furthermore, I had named him as the heir to all my unpublished manuscripts and had stated that he was to publish them at his discretion. In this way it has become possible for me since my death to have written six operas, and I hope to write more. I wish to make the whole world gasp in amazement. I wish to make the universe marvel at the tremendous number of operas I had written before the breath of life departed from me! To this end I work with a fiery energy—I am a corpse of remarkable zeal.

"Since I have died I have allowed myself extravagances that were denied me during life. I own plantations in India, a palace in Rio and a harem in Damascus. All these fancies cost money, and I have to work hard; yet I am convinced that never before has a corpse enjoyed life so vividly.

"But, alas! that all this happiness should be marred by a speck of discontent! Each of us carries his own unhappiness in himself, and my misfortune is that I love Paris so dearly, that I adore the city which I cannot see again without risking resurrection. And that is my continued nostalgia. Oh, Paris! One cannot find you in Rio, nor in India, nor in Damascus—not even in Paradise! Apropos, do you happen to know the petite Evelinette, of the Theatre des Varietes?"

"I should say I do!"

"How strange! And you see her occasionally?"

"Very frequently—she is my most intimate friend."

"What a coincidence! Has she never spoken to you about me?"

"Never!"

He suddenly grew thoughtful; then, after a short silence, he remarked: "You see, there are some disadvantages in being dead. That little toad, little Evelinette, was my last love, my only one. And yet she has succeeded in forgetting me entirely!"

Comedy of "The Little Brown Jug"

"The Little Brown Jug at Kildare" is a lively comedy built up about a resurrection of the cryptic remark of the Governor of North Carolina to the Governor of South Carolina, and at first glance it would seem that Meredith Nicholson had not an idea in the world but to furnish amusement for his host of readers. The story is full of whimsicalities, absurdities and improbabilities, and proceeds with the speed of a racing automobile. There is a notorious border ruffian named Bill Appleweight who runs an illicit still and carries on his depredations on both sides of the state line. He is just as much a citizen of one of the Carolinas as of the other, and it is just as much the duty of one governor as of the other to see him duly apprehended and punished. But the truth is that Appleweight and his adherents are too "useful" to both, and neither has the remotest intention of interfering with him. However, the law and order element and the women's civic leagues are either indifferent to the obvious or unconvinced of the necessities and in consequence they have forced matters to such a pitch that some action has become imperative. As an easy way out of an awkward dilemma, the two governors disappear, leaving neither trace nor tidings of their whereabouts. In addition to partisan friends, each governor is blessed with a superlatively beautiful, enterprising, ingenuos daughter and each is jealous of the personal and official reputation of her father. As soon as Miss Ardmore of North Carolina becomes certain that her father has purposely withdrawn himself she takes possession of his office, while Miss Osborne of South Carolina is not one moment behind her in assuming that in the absence of the state executive his duties fall naturally upon the shoulders of his eldest daughter. Simultaneously with the engulfing of the two officials there come upon the scene two young men, one an assistant professor of admiralty in the University of Virginia, and the other a New York multimillionaire with a craving for adventure and an intense longing to find himself in some unexpected situation where he may play the hero. These two are intimate friends who share peculiar tastes in common and it was the parting comment of Professor Griswold to Tommy Ardmore that they were both dreamers who only talked and let opportunities slip past them, which prompted Ardmore to answer in the affirmative when, on the train temporarily delayed in passing through Kildare, he was accosted by a mysterious stranger who asked if he were the governor and passed up to him a little brown jug. Ardmore discovered that ingeniously concealed in the corncob stopper was a message intended for Governor Ardmore, and in like mysterious fashion Griswold was trusted with a warning for Governor Osborne. Now the two young misses, despite their holding the keys to private offices and desks, and their access to rubber stamps and all the rest of the paraphernalia, were handicapped by their need of advice and assistance, and they dare not apply to the regular staff or the other officials lest they thereby acknowledge the absence of the governors and their lack of information as to their whereabouts; so on the principle of "any port in a storm" these two utter strangers became the advisors and to all intents and purposes the governors of the respective commonwealths, and carried on the business of government through the media of telegrams and letters, neither knowing that the other was pitted against him until near the end, and long ere that time each was too absorbed in his charming "governess" to care very much how the world wagged. Apparently the story is constructed on the same principle as the little brown jug which gave it its name and which could be made to yield either harmless buttermilk from the dairy of good Mrs. Appleweight or the fiery spirit from old Bill's still, according to the sophistication of the manipulator of the stopper. In that respect it resembled likewise the well known sentiments of the respective governors in the matter of liquor traffic generally, and their masterly eloquence on all topics. And after all, what DID the governor of North Carolina say to the governor of South Carolina? Form the denouement it is more than likely that he merely whispered: "Let's go off somewhere for a quiet game of poker and let the women fight it out between them." The Author of "Wuthering Heights"

Though the Bronte sisters did not reap fortune nor much fame during their own lives from the production of their romances they have proved an inexhaustible mine for others ever since. Never a year passes but that some new fact or theory is not brought to light or some old one viewed from another point. One J. Malham Dimbleby has been recently enlightening readers of the Academy on the subject of the author of "Wuthering Heights," who, he has satisfied himself, must have been Charlotte, not Emily, though the younger sister was credited because it was necessary for the real author to conceal her connection in order to avoid litigation, since she had entered into a contract with a certain firm of publishers to let them have her next work. The dissolute brother Branwell has likewise been credited with the authorship on the strength of his own half-claim and the ill-supported theory that being the only son, he must of necessity, have "inherited" more genius than his sisters. There seems to be no ground whatever for doubting the authenticity of Emily Bronte's credit except the one fact of her diffident and retiring disposition which led her to make few friends and no confidants. No one but her two sisters had any idea of what she might have been capable and unfortunately she did not live long enough to give further proofs of her ability. As to Branwell Bronte and the whys and wherefores of his inclinations and the pity that is lavished upon his wasted "genius," his case becomes simple enough when his name is translated back to its original form of Patrick Prunty. The father of the Bronte children was Irish born, one of a numerous brood of very ordinary stock. They were poor farmers and none of them showed any extraordinary ability save and except that one who betook himself from the paternal acres, gained a little education by his own efforts, and in course of time became an Episcopal clergyman. He changed his patronymic from Prunty to Bronte, forgot or ignored his origin and gave his family and new friends the impression that he was of French descent. Patrick Branwell Bronte, known always in the family circle as Branwell, was possessed of a character easy of interpretation to any one familiar with the Celtic race. Had he been raised on his ancestral acres he would have followed in the footsteps of hundreds of others of his moral kin. His glibness of speech and impudence of retort would have attracted the attention of the landlord or "the young masther," and the foolish parents, instead of insisting that he should perform his share of the work, on the same terms as his brothers and sisters, would have emancipated him from labor in order that he might sport and play with his superiors. Branwell Bronte, after exhausting the patience of his overworked and under-nourished sisters, a drain on their vitality as well as their purses, finally drank himself to death, and the only matter of regret is that he was so long about it. Patrick Prunty would have come to precisely the same end if he did not meet a speedier death in some poaching escapade, but instead of absorbing the attention of moralists and philosophers half a century and more later, he would have been forgotten within a few years, for he would have taken his place in the ranks and been dismissed with no more than a passing "What else could one look for?"

Becke in His Old Haunts

In "The Adventures of Louis Blake," Louis Becke has returned to his early love, the islands of the South Pacific. Mr. Becke has always been a good deal of a nomad, but for the last three years has been settled in France. The wanderlust has again taken possession of him, and those who fell under the spell of his writings years ago will welcome his return. How many of the gushers over "dear old San Francisco" know his "Breachley, Black Sheep," and how many more know how much of ancient history it has embalmed? "Breachley" is not necessarily another form of "Becke," but it is somebody who knew the ground he trod, and knew it well, too.

Lord Beaconfield's Maxims

Everyone loves power even if they do not know what to do with it.

Very few people reach posterity. Posterity is a most limited assemblage.

As a general rule nobody has money who ought to have it.

Always have distinguished friends. Never have fools for friends; they are of no use.

To be king of your company is a poor ambition, yet homage is homage; and smoke is smoke whether it comes out of the chimney of a palace or of a workhouse.

To govern men you must either excel them in their accomplishments or despise them.

—Where good music is prized the Steinway piano reigns supreme ---you'll want one some day.

In every nook and corner of the globe where good music is prized can be heard the voice of the Steinway Piano.

In the palaces of Kings and Emperors, in the homes of musicians of renown, aboard the ocean greyhound, in the sumptuous suites of our great American hotels, the Steinway Piano constitutes an integral and indispensable part of the furnishings.

In the foremost music schools and in the concert halls and opera houses of the art centers of both hemispheres the Steinway stands as the criterion of piano excellence by which all others are measured.

It is unquestionably and unqualifiedly the piano that is universally recognized as the world's standard—it is the ultimate piano, the one great piano we all eventually wish for—it marks the zenith of the highest aim in piano perfection and is as dear to the heart of the true musician and is as sure to be desired eventually by the pianist as a Stradivarius violin is wished for by the violinist.

We have said you will ultimately want a Steinway—

This is literally true.

It always happens and unless you guard against it you'll have to make a sacrifice when this Steinway temptation becomes too great to resist, for then you'll bargain to trade in your cheaper piano for a Steinway and unless this cheaper piano was purchased of us you'll not get all you paid for it.

To protect those who know that within a few years their love for music and ambition for the best of all things will crowd them into an intense longing for a Steinway we make the following proposition:

Any one purchasing a piano of us may exchange it at any time within three years for a Steinway, at which time we will allow them on their Steinway every cent they paid on their other piano. By this plan you practically have the use of any new piano in our store for three years and will be in a position to have a fine new Steinway whenever you want it without any loss.

A Lesson Out of the Past

Now that the City Hall is in process of demolition we are reminded of its past, and pondering its past we marvel at the courage of Mayor Taylor in assenting to the project in hand—that of rearing a new municipal building on the site of the old one. Experience teaches that to undertake the construction of a municipal building in this country is to tackle a problem abounding in inscrutable elements. It is impossible to say how little the building when completed will look like the original design, or by what amount the cost will exceed the original estimate or in what generation the pile will be finished. When the building that is being demolished was projected the municipal authorities were as light hearted over the undertaking as Mayor Taylor now appears to be. The first step taken toward the supplying the several departments of the city government with a home was an act of the Legislature. On April 4, 1870, the Legislature converted Yerba Buena Park, which was then a cemetery extending from McAllister street to Market, into a site for a City Hall, and a commission was authorized to construct a building at a cost not to exceed $1,500,000. This money the commissioners were authorized to raise by the sale of lots in the reservation. First they called for plans, and accepted those of Fuller & Laver, New York architects, who had designed the State Capitol at Albany, which cost the modest sum of $21,500,000, most of which went into the pockets of grafters. Fuller & Laver guaranteed to keep the cost of our City Hall within the limit. The first signs of a shortage developed when the lots in the reservation were auctioned off. They brought $953,000. Of that amount $500,000 was consumed in the contract for the construction of the foundation. The rest of the money went before the completion of the first story, and then the Legislature passed an act authorizing the supervisors to levy a tax each year to raise the money needed to complete the building. Then the people began to grumble, and the City Hall soon became a political issue. It was charged that there was graft in the sale of the lots, and Mayor Alvord in 1873 advised that the property be recovered. "It will be a lasting disgrace to the city," he said, " to erect so large and splendid a pile in the small tract reserved for it, hemmed in by the rows of inferior houses that will grow up around it. The lots should be repurchased, and the whole space should be converted into lawns. It is cheap and mean to deny ourselves and posterity an advantage of this kind." Mayor Alvord's words were unheeded. In 1877 the Hall of Records was finished, but long before this the plans were changed. With each change of administration came a new architect with new ideas. The original plans called for a three-story building with a mansard roof and a square tower. In the end there was no mansard roof and no square tower. Up to 1889, long before the building was finished, it cost $3,750,000, and in that year when Buckley was in power, A. T. Spotts, the Secretary of the City Hall Commission, sought to assuage the emotions of the grumbling taxpayers by informing them that in comparison with the City Hall in Philadelphia our municipal building was progressing nicely. Work on both buildings was started in 1870, and at the end of nineteen years neither was finished, but as Mr. Spotts proudly pointed out, while $13,000,000 had been consumed by the grafters of Philadelphia, only a little more than a fourth of that sum had been spent by the people of this city. The records do not indicate whether or not Mr. Spotts succeeded in stifling the roar of the populace, but from the history of the City Hall we learn that the taxpayers kept right on putting up till 1899 when after twenty-eight years of hard work the building was finished at a cost of $5,723,974. But as during all those long, weary years many parts of the building fell into decay, as soon as it was completed the work of restoration began and probably continued down to the day of the catastrophe. This brief recapitulation of the history of the City Hall we submit to Mayor Taylor, begging leave at the same time to suggest that it might be advisable for him to take precautions against a recurrence of the things by which the original City Hall was rendered somewhat archaic before it was finished.

Books "Readable and Unnecessary"

Speaking of novels that deal with the "follies and degeneracies of the rich," the ladies of the Papyrus Club pronounce them readable but unnecessary. This is not very substantial criticism. Nor is it quite sound. The readableness of a book is largely a matter of the capacity of the reader. Most of the current novels that deal with the follies and degeneracies of the rich are readable only to those who are able to feast on trash. Of course they are unnecessary, but what books are necessary? We have managed to get along very well without the lost tragedies of Aeschylus, and few there are that mourn the innumerable classics which have not come down to us, though all scholars believe that literature would be enriched were merely the poems of Sappho to be unearthed on Lesbos. We are of the opinion that most of the works of fiction now being issued by American publishers are both unreadable and unnecessary, but we have no objection to them on that score. They are a source of entertainment to some persons, and they do no harm. Not even to those books that are considered salacious do we object. Even pornographic publications are less mischievous and less harmful than much of the magazine literature of the day which is designed to incite prejudices and hatreds, to destroy faith in the fundamental principles of government, and confuse the public mind by instilling the notion that to discipline the corrupt plutocracy we must give the mob unlimited sway. The ladies of the Papyrus Club, we fear, are wasting their valuable time by concerning themselves with the evils of such fiction as purports to mirror the follies of society and which occasionally appeals to the prurient minded. It serves a more useful purpose to warn the general reader against publications which undermine faith in institutions that are justified by experience and principle, than against those which are contra bonos mores. Among the works of fiction "readable but unnecessary," dealing with the follies of society, is the "Decameron," which, though it was published in the days when the Index Expurgatorius was a terror to authors, it was not put under the Papal ban. It was a liber expurgandus but not a liber prohibitus, and the corrections insisted on related not to the licentious episodes but to passages reflecting discredit on ecclesiastical persons. These passages were rendered unobjectionable chiefly by substituting representatives of the nobility for members of the priesthood. What a change has come over the sentiment of the wise! It is still realized that for civilizing purposes, for the advancement of mankind, art is not less important than religion, and yet we restrict it in the choice of its themes, put bounds to imagination, and give absolute freedom to the philosophy of the illiterate.

The Faker In Journalism

Our esteemed contemporary, the Globe, has been calling attention to some of the more notable of the fake stories of a sensational character with which newspapers in various parts of the country have been regaling their readers. And the Globe tells us the faker does not last long in journalism; that as soon as he is detected he has to say farewell "to the newspaper business wherever he is known." Not everybody will give credence to this assertion as it seems highly improbable that yellow journalism, which dominates newspaperdom, is intolerant of the habitual faker. But the assertion is true. It must not be inferred, however, that yellow journalism abhors distortion of the truth or plausible fiction. The only faker who is not wanted by yellow journals is the one that deceives the editors as well as the readers. The editor of a yellow journal has irremovable objections against being deceived or gulled by his reporters. He prefers that there shall be no faking except such as he orders; or, at any rate, none of which he is not cognizant. Though the habitual faker to whom the Globe refers, the man who cheats editors with spurious wares, is an object of aversion in newspaperdom, he is in reality one of the most harmless of journalists. By inventing plausible stories for popular consumption and fabricating colorful details to give verisimilitude to bald and uninteresting narratives he supplies a great deal of entertainment. As the incidents he describes are imaginary, and the persons are abstractions, he inflicts no suffering and impairs nobody's reputation. If by his deceptions we are led to marvel at things that never happened or sympathize with persons that never existed, no harm is done. How much better it would be were the news of much that happens suppressed and the space thus created were devoted to the preposterous yarns of the innocuous faker! The faking in journalism that works michief is that which is designed to mislead public opinion, and the extent to which it is practiced is beyond the conception of anybody who has no acquaintance with unscrupulous newspapers. And generally the most unscrupulous are those that are most vociferous in proclaiming their own rectitude and in affirming their loyalty to the cause of civic virtue. With at least one journal of this class the Globe has been having much experience ever since the day of its birth, and happily, we believe, the experience is conducive to steadfastness in the course it is pursuing since the supremacy which it has attained is due as much to popular disgust with the methods of others as to the wisdom of its own policy.

For the Public Benefit

To the voters at the coming election will be submitted an amendment to the Constitution of the State, known as Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 31. This is a proposition upon which there is no difference of opinion. Its purpose is to enable banking, trading or benevolent corporations to extend the life of their corporate franchise. The amendment was drawn at the request of several commercial and savings banks the corporate charters of which will soon expire. It will obviate the necessity of these banks being reorganized and incorporated anew, which is something that cannot be accomplished without the hazard of complications that might result in widespread injury. The amendment is commended therefore not only in the interest of banking corporations, but for the benefit of everybody whose financial affairs might be involved. Nobody need have any fear of any kind of advantage being derived through this amendment by any of the public service corporations. It is guaranteed to be jokerless. Special care was taken by the authors of the amendment to exclude the octopus from participation in the benefits which are designed to accrue.

Result of Naval Conference

Hereafter all plans of battleships must be submitted to a special board of naval officers and be subject to its decision. This is the substance of a resolution adopted at the Newport Naval Conference, at which there was abundant corroboration of the assertion that there were grave defects in armor belts, in ammunition lifts, in the location of the magazines and in other vital features of our war vessels. The whole system under which the naval department has been conducted was condemned and the methods of the construction bureau especially censured. The responsibility in the future will be where it should belong—upon the seagoing officers of the line. For years the construction department has been subject to the imperious will of Mr. Roosevelt's pet—Chief Constructor Capps, who, it appears, habitually ignored all official criticisms and recommendations. The Newport Conference approved many suggestions and remonstrances contained in communications which have been lying in Constructor Capps's pigeon holes. It is impossible to estimate accurately how many millions of dollars have been wasted during the long period in which we have been indulging the stupidity and vanity of the great man who embodied the whole system, but more disquieting than the pecuniary loss is the knowledge that our vessels are not as fit as they should be. How unfortunate that Mr. Roosevelt does not abhor fools as well as knaves!

Heney's Assault on Judge Melvin

The Berkeley preacher and the congregation of the Berkeley church from whose pulpit Mr. Heney was permitted to speak of Supreme Justice Melvin as "no better than a boodling Supervisor," have learned the worth of Mr. Heney's word, and they have learned the weight of his judgment upon the character of men. To class Judge Melvin with the "boodling Supervisors" upon whose testimony, under immunity contracts issued by the graft prosecution, Mr. Heney hopes to convict all whom the prosecution has accused, is a venemous slander upon a citizen whose character has never before been impugned. Judge Melvin has grown to manhood in the community where Mr. Heney saw fit to cast upon him the slime of foul accusation. His integrity as a man has never been questioned; his rectitude as a lawyer and an attorney for the interests of his fellow citizens, has never been doubted; his faithful adherence to every principle of justice, equity and honest purpose while he was on the bench of the Superior Court of Alameda County, has been universally conceded by all who have had dealings with him in that office. The first shaft of detraction ever hurled at Judge Melvin was from the quiver of malicious libel that Francis J. Heney carries with him wherever he goes—into the hustings of partisan politics, into the law courts where he prosecutes men to whom he has promised "immunity," into the pulpits of churches that stand for "moral reform" without knowledge of the thing they ought to reform. In this instance Mr. Heney had to eat his words as he was compelled upon another occasion to acknowledge that he had no proof with which to substantiate a public accusation. Face to face with Judge Melvin whom he had so foully aspersed he denied that he had uttered the words imputed to him; denied his slanderous assault; denied the unanimous report of his libel as published in the newspapers; and accused those who heard him compare Judge Melvin to the "boodling Supervisors," of lying. There is no defense for Judge Melvin against such men as Francis J. Heney. There is no escape from their calumny. To invoke the law that would put them in jail for a cowardly misdemeanor is not worth while; to chase their lies is a waste of time; to lay hands upon them in angry violence is to touch pitch and be defiled. Judge Melvin must content himself with the esteem of his friends and the consciousness of his own integrity.

His Friend of the Pulpit

Sensible as we are of the fact that the Berkeley church in which Mr. Heney was permitted to spew venomous abuse on Judge Melvin was not the only house of divine worship in which that foul-tongued slanderer entertained and thrilled pious lovers of detraction, we now feel that it would be interesting to learn whether as an itinerant preacher of the gospel of hate he is still welcome on the circuit that is dotted with the sacred edifices where the faithful are wont to perform their spiritual exercises. We wonder whether Mr. Heney has lost caste; whether having convicted himself out of his own mouth of being a vicious and irresponsible purveyor of calumny, he is no longer considered available for pulpit-thumping purposes, or whether the high-minded clerical gentlemen with whom he has mingled in the communion of verbal thunder would still condescend with devout avidity to partake with him at the altar of partisan fury of the eucharist of evil-speaking. It would not surprise us in the least to learn that Mr. Heney is still in good standing; or, at least, that he is still enjoying the sympathy and commanding the approval of the professional exponents of Christianity, who are convinced that as crimes were committed in San Francisco and as some of the criminals are being prosecuted it is their duty as the representatives of a moral force to give aid to the prosecutors. The preacher is by habit and temperament a closet philosopher. He is so used to meditation upon abstract theology and metaphysical problems, that he cannot readily adapt himself to actual and material conditions. He reasons from theory to fact, from shadow to motive, like Bucephalus whom Alexander tamed by running him against the sun. His reasoning is by deduction from a premiss stated in the news or editorial columns of his favorite newspaper. It is seldom that the preacher gets out of his study to converse with the man in the street, or to verify what he has read in the newspaper regarding some vital question of the hour or current issue. He cannot be blamed, therefore, for any biased opinion he may utter, except, perhaps, on the ground that he has not taken the trouble or had the inclination to hear the other side. The preachers who have encouraged the propagation of slander in their pulpits are apparently factors in the moral equation of the community; doubtless they are sincere in their effort to improve what they honestly consider to be bad conditions; but in every instance they have been grossly deceived by those in whom they have placed implicit confidence; they are blind to the truth because they will not investigate for themselves; they are bigoted in a second-hand faith; they are moral reformers by proxy; they trust too much to such inspiration as they receive from the Spreckels organ and Mr. Spreckels' man Heney. And having permitted themselves to become bitter partisans in one of the meanest and most sordid feuds that ever afflicted a community, in all probability they now feel themselves constrained to herd with the cattle of their choice to the bitter end. And how bitter it will be—the inevitable end!

The Possible Determining Factor

As election day draws near the more apparent it becomes that the bulk of Mr. Taft's support is of the half-hearted variety. Even some of the influential Republican journals frankly confess that they are for Taft only for the reason that the alternative is too shocking to contemplate. The remarkable situation in which we now find ourselves is aptly described by Leslie M. Shaw, once Secretary of the Treasury. "I think it is unfortunate," he says, "that the American people now have no conservative leader; that those who cherish representative government as planned by the fathers are afforded only the opportunity of choosing between radical parties, and will have to take that one which, in their judgment, is disposed to be least radical, and whose leader is temperamentally the best calculated to preserve those institutions which were so wisely planned by the founders of the Republic." And the statesman who gave utterance to these sentiments is one of the Republican spellbinders in this campaign! Evidently he is not advocating Mr. Taft's election with much enthusiasm. Like many others he is making his choice between what he conceives to be two evils. Judging, however, from the arguments that are made in favor of Taft's election in some quarters, there are many Republicans of the opinion that to avert a recurrence of the present situation they should vote for Bryan and thus teach their party a lesson so that henceforth it will stick to the conservative principles that are enjoined by tradition. To dissuade men of this mind from their purpose it is argued that in the event of Bryan's election there will be more danger of Roosevelt's return to the White House at the end of four years than if Taft be chosen. And this belief, says one New York paper, may be the determining consideration in the election.

If having squandered years to grave a gem
Commission'd by thine absent Lord; and while
'Twas incomplete,
Others would bribe thy needy skill to them—
Dismiss them to the street!

Should'st thou at last discover Beauty's grove,
At last be panting on the fragrant verge,
But in the track,
Drunk with divine possession, thou meet Love—
Turn, at her bidding, back.

When round thy ship in tempest Hell appears,
And every spectre mutters up more dire
To snatch control
And loose to madness thy deep-kennell'd fears—
Then to the Helm, O Soul!

Last, if upon the cold green-mantling sea
Thou cling, alone with Truth, to the last spar,
Both castaway,
And one must perish—let it not be he Whom thou art sworn to obey!

Perspective Impressions

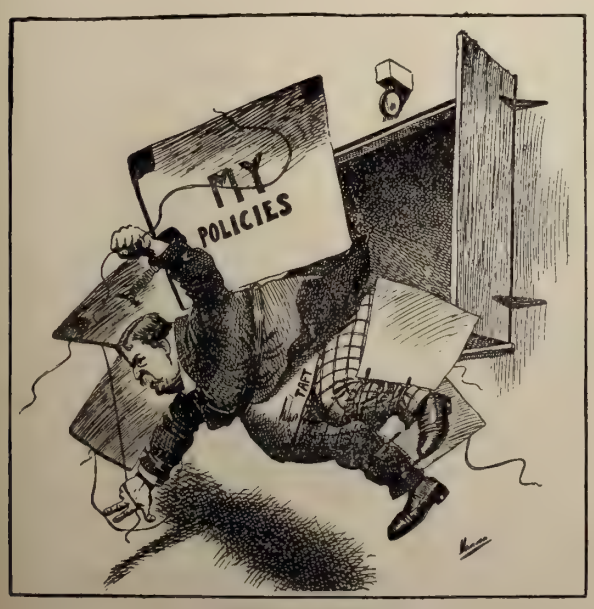
The hardest thing to forget is that which one does not want to remember.

Senator Elkins appears to know much less than the reporters about his daughter's engagement to the Duke of Abruzzi.

Since Satan rebuked sin there has been no such paradox as a machine politician on the Harbor Commission raising his voice in virtuous indignation at machine politics.

The sensational suit against a coterie of Oakland bankers will probably make it clear that high finance on the other side of the bay is synonymous with low cunning.

"Mr. Roosevelt has no control over art," says Israel Zangwill. Nobody ever said he had. Its nature that Mr. Roosevelt has control over; all nature but his own, which is simply beyond control.



In Pittsburg, the home of frisky millionaires, the authorities have decreed that the Salome dance must not be done except in a long skirt. But they had one performance in little more than a smile which was probably considered too diaphanous. Besides there's the danger of the lady's catching cold.

Judge Lawlor is willing to try the Ruef case in a theatre of average seating capacity. Astonishing! But the judge is modest. The District Attorney should have suggested a tent and three rings.

The New York Post says that "posterity offers Mr. Bryan a place beside Demosthenes, Danton and Daniel Webster." But Mr. Bryan doesn't want a place beside any dead ones. Moreover the place he wants he wants when he wants it, and posterity hasn't a vote yet.

The lid is off in the tenderloin and not a cent is being paid for protection, but the gamblers and deadfall keepers have been enlisted in the cause of good government. All have agreed, in consideration of the liberty which they have been vouchsafed, to vote for the one just judge. Incredible? Take an hour off and find out for yourself.

"If you want to know law without loopholes," says the Rev. Dr. Rader, "you will find it in the Bible." The same Bible we suppose which the Devil can quote to suit his purpose; which tells us that David after the killing of Uriah and the seduction of his wife, exclaimed to God, "Against thee only I have sinned;" the same Bible to which Milton referred when he spoke of "dancing divines" who "came to us with Scripture in their mouths fitted for their turns with a double, contradictory sense." No loopholes therein, but barn doors a-plenty.

The Ruling Passion

Being a Brief and Altogether Inadequate Dissertation Upon the Extreme Antiquity of the Essentially Human Proclivity for Recording the More or Less Edifying Thoughts of Those Who Think They Are Born to Instruct Their Fellow Men, With a Shrewd Guess as to What Will Happen When There is Nothing More to Write About.

By Democritus

Man is a writing animal. He began to write about the time when his dawning intelligence taught him that he could obtain fire by rubbing two sticks together. That was the greatest discovery in all the annals of human progress; and the invention of the alphabet about a million years subsequently, was the next long stride towards the existing condition of humanity, called "civilization."

The Chinese records name Fu Hi as the eponmous founder of the empire, and ascribe to him the invention of nets and snares for fishing and hunting; he also taught the people how to rear domestic animals and was the first ruler that formulated the institution of marriage. It was in the reign of Fu Hi that Tsong Chi is supposed to have invented the Chinese characters, which are symbols, not of sounds, but of objects and ideas.

After Fu Ii it was easy sailing on the ocean of time. In the "Age of the Five Emperors" the people learned the arts of agriculture, markets were established for the sale of farm produce, the medicinal properties of plants were discovered and applied, the sages wrote ponderous treatises on diseases and their remedies, astrology and astronomy came into vogue and were formulated by "the Five Observers of the heavenly bodies; and the science of "squeeze" or graft, as the Western philologists call it, was invented and adopted as a national system of economics.

Previous to the Age of the Five Emperors the Middle Kingdom was governed by the "Three Rulers," when everybody lived in caves, ate wild fruits and uncooked food, drank the blood of animals and wore the skins of wild beasts—a period which the modern scientists have agreed to call "the Old Stone Age," in contradistinction to the New Stone Age or neolithic epoch. It is generally conceded that pleistocene man did not know how to write; he had not yet learned to plow; and it is doubtful if he could address his fellow citizens in consecutive speech for more than half a minute without exhausting his vocabulary. This would indicate that the art of oratory is a comparatively recent human acquirement. Man unquestionably wrote his thoughts on the rocks or on the sand and long before he uttered them in speech and argument. The first authentic record of oratorical expression is in the speech of the serpent to Mother Eve in the Garden of Eden; and the same record informs us that the last of the antidiluvians had developed the art from mere formal sophistry sufficiently plausible to deceive the reasoning powers of a primitive woman whose intuitions yearned to be convinced, to a high standard of satire and sarcasm which with their latest breath they hurled at Noah and his menagerie as he went on board of the ark. In the Dumb Age there were no Heneys, as there were no Achs.

The Talkative Age began with the proto-Aryans whose habitat was in the steppe region between the Carpathians and the Hindu-Kush. It has persisted with diminishing fury to the present time and will probably cease altogether after the mild clamor of the American presidential campaign. From Cicero and Demosthenes to Bryan and Taft is a far drop; and from Clay and Webster to Hearst and Hisgen is a long leap from the sublime to the ridiculous. Oratory will soon be one of the lost arts.

Few writers are good orators but all orators are writers—good, bad and indifferent. Orators are going out of fashion because there is no law compelling everybody to listen; writing is becoming universal because it is possible to write stuff that nobody wants to read. Bacon says that reading maketh a full man, conference (oratory) a ready, and writing an exact man; therefore, if a man write little, he had need of a great memory; if he confer little (that is, if he is not an orator), he had need of a present wit; and if he read little, he had need have much cunning to seem to know that he doth not know. Bacon was the wisest of men, as he is said to have been the meanest; and from his dictum we may infer that reading is the most essential thing in human knowledge, and that the source of reading is writing—not "conference," which only maketh a man ready of speech without depth of logic or breadth of understanding.

I am aware that in thus guessing the intellectual status of our pre-historic ancestors, I am at variance with the scientific conclusions of that eminent archaeologist, Professor Jack London; but I can't help that. The facts as I find them in the records of expert investigators and authoritative paleontologists do not jibe at any angle with the deductions of Professor London as that famous ethnologist has compiled them for the magazines and book publishers. Nowhere in the works of Worsaae, Steenstrup, Forchhammer, Schliemann, Hochstadter, Larkin, Serviss, Sayce, Layard, Lepsius, Mariette, Maspero, Petrie or Peters, do I find the slightest trace of the pre-Adamites mentioned by Professor London. On the contrary, these authorities agree that pre-historic man, immediately after he ceased to be a monkey, spoke a very simple and primitive language and was utterly incapable of writing for the magazines, even if his thoroughly savage inclination had impelled him to that folly.

Man as a writing animal does not develop until about 15,000 B. C. when a few obscure Akkadian authors and a little group of pre-historic Egyptians began to put their crude thoughts into ideographs and hieroglyphs. From the Akkadian literary cult we derive the cuneiforms of the Babylonian bricks and the Assyrian tablets from which the Hebrew scribes in captivity compiled their Book of Genesis; and from the phonetic hieroglyphs of the early Egyptian novelists our "best sellers" have plagiarised the plots and characters of their tales.

By the time the Keltiberians, the Etruscans, the Libyans, the Tauergs and the Phoenicians had perfected their alphabetical systems from their cumbrous pictographic, phonogrammic, phonoglyphic, ideographic methods, all the stories had been written, all the plots had been devised, all the poetry had been recited and transcribed, all the wisdom of man had been recorded, and nothing, absolutely nothing, was left for the writers who began to swarm down the ringing grooves of change, a motley, heterogeneous mob of conscious and unconscious imitators, ranging in native ability from Homer and Shakespeare to Ella Wheeler Wilcox and Laura Jean Libbey.

There were Homers before the blind bard of Chios; there were tragic poets when the site of Babylon was a waste untrodden by the feet of the conquering Elamite; the inspiration of Aeschylus and the god-like genius of Sophocles was a commonplace when the Egyptians of the fourth dynasty were welding copper and tin to make bronzes for the tombs of their kings in the pyramid of Medum; men were writing philosophy with graving tools on slabs of diorite when the ancestors of Aristotle were roving shepherds on the Iranian uplands—blue eyed Aryans and blond-haired Pelasgians.

Thus we find that the scribbling mania is as old, or almost as old as the oldest profession. It is almost coeval with the vanity of man. And I predict that when all life and heat and sustenance shall depart from this age-weary world, leaving but one expiring member of humanity solitary on a peak in Darien, shivering in the icy blast from the glacial prairies of the frozen ocean relentlessly and remorselessly advancing with irresistible uplift to clothe the dead planet in the eternal shroud of dead worlds buried in the vast cemetery of the universe—when this last man feels the gripe of death upon the last vital part of a long-starved stomach, before he lifts his despairing eyes to the place where he thinks his God is gazing in pity upon his agony, I venture to prophesy that his last act of intelligent volition will be to write down on a sheet of paper—perhaps on the back of the envelope containing his last will and testament—a brief account of the Final Catastrophe!

Our Prosperous Landlords

How the Merchants of San Francisco Attest Their Faith in the City's Future While Being Gouged to Make Many a Holiday for the Public Spirited Citizens to Whom We Are Indebted For Our Many Beautiful Buildings.

Let us consider the landlords of San Francisco, how they grow; they toil not neither do they spin; they wax fat on the unearned increment and luxuriate in the sweat of their tenants. We are very proud of our landlords, especially of the ones that have reared fine buildings and caused the world to applaud the pluck and energy of the city by the Golden Gate. In nowise does it diminish the glory of our landlords to attribute their pluck and energy to the exigencies of a situation that was not to be avoided. It was of course to their own interest to improve their property and rehabilitate the city, but the same may be said of all that plunged into save what remained of the wreck and recover lost ground. I am not disposed to detract from the credit to which it is generally conceded those men are entitled who have spent their money in the rebuilding of San Francisco, nor is it my purpose to invoke censure on some for the inordinate and unexampled greed which they are now exhibiting. I realize that the impulses and instincts of human nature do not vary much in the divers departments of human activity. My purpose is to make the San Francisco landlord serve to show that while we all feel more or less contempt for each other's selfishness, if we were to reflect we should see that none of us is entirely free from the quality which we abhor.

There is much declaiming these days against the public service corporations of San Francisco which of course are not deserving of much sympathy; but if we compare the public service corporations with the unorganized but entrenched landlords we shall find that we have been far from impartial or just in the distribution of our objurgations. We are told by our ardent and vociferous civic patriots, most of whom are bloated landlords, that it is an outrage for the stockholders of a public service corporation to expect more than five per cent on his investment; but the landlord, without a blush, will charge anything from seven to twelve per cent for the use of his property, and at the same time flatter himself that for having built an imposing pile on land which has trebled in value since the date of his purchase, he is entitled to the homage of the people to whom, as a matter of fact, he is indebted for his unearned increment. Unlike the stockholder of a public service corporation the landlord has an absolutely safe investment. No demagogue can depreciate the value of his holdings; no boodler can blackmail him out of his profits, yet he objects to rates that yield over five per cent.

Immediately after the fire the rapacity of the landlord in the residence district did more toward depopulating the city than the ravages of the catastrophe. And now the landlord in the business district is compelling the merchant to vindicate his faith in the future of the city by paying more rent than he paid in the days before the fire. Of course there are exceptions. Several of our leading merchants have entered into very satisfactory leases but the screws are being turned on the small merchant. Acting on the principle that it is the privilege of the owner of a building to charge all the traffic will bear many of our landlords are fixing their rents on the basis of a traffic far in excess of what it was in the boom days before the fire. Consequently many small merchants who are eager to move down town are unable to do so, while others are entering into leases through sheer desperation. In some instances the landlords have attempted to justify their action by attributing it to the high cost of labor and material and the high rates of interest which they are paying for the money they borrowed to erect their buildings. But on their own figures they convict themselves of gouging. In some instances no apology is offered. One gentleman, for example, who gets $300 a month for property that yielded $50 before the earthquake, regards the phenomenon as a great joke.

I have been investigating the landlord business of San Francisco and I have gathered some interesting data. For example, I have learned of a proposition made to a merchant by the representative of an estate that owns a lot 28 by 80 feet on the west side of Grant avenue between O'Farrell and Geary streets. The merchant was asked to pay $800 a month. This price was not fixed with reference to the cost of a loan or the cost of a building; for the merchant was expected to put up his own building and pay $800 a month for the land. Some months ago the Van Ness Theatre people while looking for a theatre site on Market street came across Rudolph Spreckels who agreed to build a theatre for them if they would pay him sufficient rent. The amount demanded was more per front foot than is paid for any theatre on Broadway, New York.

The hardest bargain driver among the landlords of San Francisco, I have ascertained, is that eminent civic patriot, corporation-baiter and friend of the people, the Hon. James D. Phelan. We are more proud of Mr. Phelan than of any other citizen and we point with more consuming pride to his beautiful building at the gore of O'Farrell and Market than to any other. It is a graceful structure and it beams like Jimmy himself in his happiest moments. But how much revenue do you suppose Jimmy expects to get out of that building? Just $450,000 a year, or nine per cent on a valuation of $5,000,000. The building cost $2,250,000, which sum Mr. Phelan borrowed from the Equitable Life Insurance Company at five and one-quarter per cent net. The loan with taxes and insurance will cost him seven and one-quarter per cent; so it is evident that after paying the price of the loan and incidentals our young millionaire will have a tidy sum left over; a very tidy sum considering that the land which is now worth in the neighborhood of $3,000,000 cost his father less than two hundred thousand.

Of course Mr. Phelan is entitled to all the money that he can make his property yield, but as in the role of a public spirited citizen, one that hates public service corporations on account of the way they gouge poor ratepayers, it may be worth while to inquire as to the extent

Suicide

By Georges Maurevert

San Romano! What a delightful place! Here one fully understands the words of Flaubert, "There are some places in the world so beautiful that one has a desire to press them to his heart." What a pity that San Romano resembles an exquisite fruit whose taste is so bitter that we dare not eat it with impunity, since it causes death. Unfortunately the joyous peace that lies over the scene does not reign within the hearts of the people. On every side you meet sorrowful faces from whose lips these strange words seem to fall, "Oh, had I only placed it upon seven. The accursed rouge! Ten times in succession it won and I played noir."

They pay little or no attention to the scenic beauty of San Romano. They are Oedipus in the struggle with the Sphinx Zero. The earth to them seems but as a gigantic roulette and the sky is a slate of trente et quarante, for this is the Kingdom of Mammon, the Residence of the Demon Chance.

I, also, was a subject of his for a few months, lost a small fortune and became somewhat gray. One day, I wakened with only twelve francs in my pocket, and I owed the landlord fifteen. So I examined my pistol carefully and made sure that it was well loaded with six bullets, for these would certainly suffice to blow out a brain like mine.

I opened the window. "My last morning" was glorious —the heavens, azure blue; the waves, a shimmering green; and the air, heavy with the fragrance of the orange and the violet. I strolled down to the shore so as to once more breathe in the refreshing salt air; then I took a short walk and found that I was hungry. Before returning to the hotel, I bought a paper, the "Anti-San Romano," a sensation weekly edged in black like a mourning letter. During breakfast I hastily turned the pages. The heading, "Suicides of the Week," drew my attention to it. "Here also my death will be reported within the next few days," I thought without much emotion. I even had a desire to thank the writer of my obituary in advance.

One notice, marked with a heavy black cross, attracted my attention and I read, "Yesterday the body of Joshua Jacobson, an American, was found hanging from one of the palms that grow upon the terrace. The sum of three thousand francs was in his pocket—naturally!"

Joshua Jacobson, I had known him well—I might say that we had gambled away, side by side, one franc after the other. During the previous evening in the Casino, where he had lost his last penny, he had grasped my hand with much feeling, had looked sadly into my eyes and smiling, said in a low voice, "I am ruined, utterly ruined. Farewell, my friend—" and went out and—hanged himself.

Still, how was it possible that three thousand francs had been found on him and what the devil did that "naturally" mean? After a few moments, light began to dawn upon me. How stupid not to think of it at once! Of course the proprietors of the Casino had had the money put into his pockets so that we should not think his suicide due to his losses. That was self-evident. Then I began to wonder how much money would be placed in my pockets if I should carry out my intentions and take my life near the Casino. I think I had lost as much money as Jacobson. And then—suddenly an idea rushed into my head faster than the bullet I had intended for it. Excited, but with a light heart, I continued my breakfast. Then I went to the landlord, told him that I would pay him fifteen francs that evening, "Provided," I added, with a sad smile, "that I am still alive."

"My dear sir, we trust you implicitly."

"Then," said I, "please lend me one hundred francs until this evening. I am expecting money from Paris."

"Certainly."

I spent the afternoon on the beach where, after careful deliberation, I planned the various steps of an advantageous suicide.

That evening at nine I donned my best-fitting dress suit, tied my most elaborate cravat and went to the Casino. I made it quite evident I risked my last coin and should have been greatly chagrined had I won. I lost, and assumed first a troubled, then an angry, then a meditative mien. An attendant, who knew me, became interested in my fate. In low, sad tones I told him of my ruin. He sympathized with me, and sought to comfort me.

"You can still have your traveling expenses home, for the Casino makes it a point of honor——"

"The way that I go needs no ticket," I interrupted with deep earnestness.

He looked at me, amazed. "You are not in earnest. You are not going to be a fool, I hope."

I remained silent and turned my back on him. Looking about carelessly after several minutes, I noticed the attendants of the Casino watching me. Toward eleven the crowd of players arose. I went out among the last, hanging my head and looking thoroughly crushed.

The night was glorious. The moon bathed forest and sea in a flood of light. In the distance, I heard violins Deciding quickly, I directed my steps towards a great bush of rhododendron not far from the Casino, a place that seemed a fit setting for the joke I had planned. My hasty preparations were carried out in the presence of a marble nymph that seemed to smile, then—crack, crack, two shots rang out. I fell, not without care, upon a bench and waited. Voices in the distance came nearer and nearer, and shadows fell across my closed eyes.

"My God, it is he! How awful, pierced with two bullet!" Then the voice of the attendant whom I knew, "Hurry, hurry, before anyone comes. Oh, the rascal, couldn't he have done this somewhere else?"

He bent over me and I felt that he slipped something into my pocket.

I almost choked. I groaned twice, slowly opened my eyes, raised myself with great care and looked in astonishment at the crowd. Unconcerned, I took my hat and my still smoking pistol and arose.

The crowd looked on with increasing astonishment. They stared at me as if I were some strange animal.

"This is unheard of!" I said angrily. "One can't even kill himself without causing a sensation."

The attendant who knew me came toward me enraged. "My dear sir, I would—well,—you—?" he stammered, confused. "What do you mean by this farce? I shall have you arrested for disturbing the peace."

"Disturbing the peace!" I repeated, bitterly. "That is well said; that will become the watchword of the season." And I walked away, dignified but inwardly laughing at the crowd of people who had gathered out of curiosity.

I returned to my hotel and paid my debts out of the three thousand francs earned through my suicide.

The bank made repeated efforts to collect the money from me, but it never entered my mind to return it, for I considered that it had been legally given to me. Furthermore I believe that three thousand francs is not too large a fee for a suicide.

To vex them, I lived high for a few days upon the money, and then went to Paris. Subsequently I learned that the sum bestowed on suicides by the Casino of San Romano has been considerably reduced.

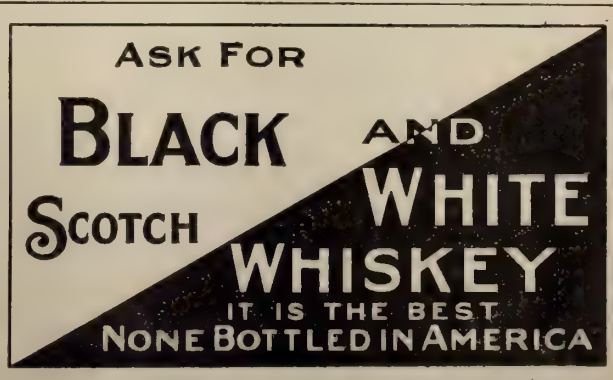
The Centuries of the Turk

Harry Seakes.

The Sick Man of the East is in sore distress and is apparently approaching his last gasp. All that checks his tardy demise is the inability of the divided Great Powers to come to an agreement upon the division of his estate. Will the present action of Austro-Hungary, Germany and Italy force a quick dismemberment at this juncture, or is the seizure of Bosnia and Herzegovina but one of the score of moves in the last hundred years leading slowly toward the inevitable end? Conditions are rapidly becoming such that it does not seem possible to prolong life much longer in his weakened body.

History contains no more striking lesson than the rise and fall of nations. Today no country of standing in the world presents a more abject physical condition than does Turkey and yet for a thousand years the Turks dominated the civilized world and controlled it by sheer force of arms; their greatest leader, Genghis Kahn, ruled over the largest empire the world has ever seen, an empire reaching from the Sea of Japan across the steppes of Asia and deep into Central Europe. All Russia, Hungary, Greece and parts of Germany were under their rule. They controlled the Mediterranean and their fierce soldiers drove the Slavs, French and Germans fleeing before them across the Elbe. Their name was a terror throughout over one-half of the then known globe. Not till some three hundred years ago did their awful grip on Europe begin to relax and it has gradually been growing weaker and weaker till all that remains in the now lax fingers are the few provinces bordering the Bosphorus. In the last twenty years more than two-thirds of the Turkish territory in Europe has been wrested away.

Like all movements of people that take their origin in the Orient the rise and national character of the Turks seem strange, almost incomprehensible, to the Occidental mind. Perhaps, in a way, it is because their records are so meagre, for the Turks were soldiers above all, and made no pretensions to philosophy and letters. If in their conquests they encountered a civilization or a religion that seemed good to them they adopted it. They have given little to the world and they have taken all they could seize. In this way they embraced Christianity, Buddhism, Fire Worship and finally Mohammedanism, under another great conqueror, Tamerlane.



Turkish history is a record of dynasties rather than a history of nations or even tribes. The names Ottoman, Seldjuk, Mameluke, Mogul and others do not apply to the people but to the founders of the empires. The Ottoman Turks, so called after their leader Othman, entered Asia Minor early in the thirteenth century and established the present Turkish empire. They numbered only four hundred families. The Turks who were already in the country, under the rule of the Seldjuks, remained there and become Ottomans. Other Turks were constantly coming in from Central Asia. Confusion has occurred in Turkish history on account of the different names which have been given to the different sections of the Turkish race at different times. The word Tartar is perhaps the most confusing of all since it has neither dynastic nor territorial significance. It appears to be a Mogul word, which means "tributary," and it was applied to all the forces of the great conqueror Genghis Kahn, without distinction of race. His followers who invaded Europe were his tartars, his tributaries. It was never applied to the Seldjuk or Ottoman Turks because they were known in Europe as Turks long before his time (1210). It is now applied extensively to those who are or who have been under Ottoman rule, although it is not used by the Ottomans themselves.

As early as 545 A. D. these tartars or Turks, wild, nomadic, fighting tribes on the plains to the north of China, began to worry the rulers of that country. Mixed up with them were Mongols, Manchus, Finns and Huns, all fighting among themsevles and uniting occasionally to raid the rich Chinese territories lying south of them. Nothing definite is known of their origin or relationship. They were so intermingled, so clearly connected in their language, their manners, their religion and their history that they cannot be treated as different races. Whether they were all Turks or not is only a question of names. The modern Turk is probably right in asserting that the name was originally that of a great chief, the founder of a dynasty. Chinese chronicles of 500 A. D. describe these Turks as a tribe to the north, nomads, hunters, raisers of cattle, having tents of felt—good horsemen and archers, with horn bows, swords, daggers and breast plates. "They are rude and brutal, neglect the old and care only for men in the prime of life. Their writing resembles that of barbarians. They glory in dying on the field of battle. When the Turk is in the saddle he no longer knows his own father." In 569 A. D. a great leader arose among these Turks. He founded a powerful kingdom and attempted to bring together the two great civilized powers of the world, Rome and China, with himself as the connecting link to handle the trade of both nations. Death cut short his plan. Under weak rulers the Turks split up again into wandering tribes and were comparatively quiet for several centuries. Then began the lines of great organizers and conquerors of which Genghis Kahn (1283) was the most famous. He was exceptionally fortunate in his generals, and devoted his time more to organizing than to fighting, but he was himself one of the greatest of soldiers. His victorious successors wedged their way into the heart of Europe far past the locality where the present troubles are now going on in Servia and Bosnia. They conquered the territories from the Vistula to the Elbe, from the Danube to the Adriatic sea. Poles, Hungarians, Germans, Bohemians and Slavonians, Italians and Greeks, came under their sway. Sweden and Norway were so alarmed that they did not dare to send out their fishing fleets. Central Europe was under their dominion as well as all Russia, where their rule lasted two hundred and fifty years.

On May 29, 1453, after a stubborn contest the Turkish banner was at last planted over the Greek church in Constantinople, the Byzantine Empire ended and the Turk was firmly planted in Europe. Syria, Persia, Egypt, Algeria and the most of the countries bordering the Mediterranean paid them fealty. The height of his power and the glory of his later splendor was marked by the reign of Solyman, the Magnificent (1520-1566).

The empire established by Genghis Kahn is called Mogul rather than Turkish but this greatest of conquerors was of Turkish parentage and his army was composed chiefly of Turks. There was no distinct Mogul state before the twelfth century. It was called Tartar but nearly one-half of it was composed of Turkish tribes. Several of Genghis Kahn's leading generals were Christians, as was the wife of his son. As early as 334 A. D. the Turks had embraced Christianity and for centuries Christianity and Buddhism were the prevailing religions among them. It was not till their victorious banners swept towards the West that they became indoctrinated with Mohammed-

Our Wandering Seals

Have our old friends, the sea lions, who in panic fled from their aquatic solarium when the Cliff House was on fire, found more congenial lounging quarters, or are they eagerly waiting for "Jack" Tait to get busy again? This is a question upon which there is much speculation, and it is not all inspired with mere sentiment; for the seals are something more than objects of affection, or even than objects of curiosity. As a unique attraction they are of inestimable value not only to the owners of the Cliff House but to the whole city. The return of the big herd is therefore a desideratum of considerable importance, one that should concern us quite as much as some of the issues of the campaign. Dr. David Starr Jordan, who is an authority on seals as well as most everything else, is of the opinion, I am told, that the seals will return. The distinguished scientist reasons out the probability of their return by analogy. Once before, he says, a fire caused them to desert the rocks, and they sojourned in other parts until the lights in a new Cliff House lured them back. The instinct of the moth and not the instinct of the singed cat is what controls the conduct of the seals in the opinion of the scholar of Palto Alto who specializes in fish. But now comes Dr. McLaren, the learned botanist of Golden Gate Park, with something on his lips that resembles a sneer, dogmatizing thus for my edification: "Jordan doesn't know what he's talking about. The seals don't migrate at night. They'll return, but it will be when the sun is in the heavens. Light doesn't concern them half so much as warmth."

When Scientists Disagree

Thus we see that between two learned scientists there may be an irreconcilable conflict of opinion out of which may come unity of conclusion. Both Dr. McLaren and Dr. Jordan agree that the seals will return, but each has a different view respecting the motive of their return. Of the soundness of Dr. McLaren's view I was somewhat skeptical because I know that flora and not fauna are his specialty, whereas Dr. Jordan, I know, is a fish expert, on most familiar terms with seals; so familiar that Uncle Sam employed him many years ago to investigate the affairs of the fur-bearing amphibian in Arctic waters, and to report the measures that should be taken to ameliorate the condition of the downtrodden beast and encourage the propagation of the species. Dr. Jordan has been known ever since as the seal's friend, the kind of friend that to be delivered from is often a consummation devoutly to be wished. These things I told to Dr. McLaren, suggesting that Dr. Jordan ought to know whereof he speaks. "Well, he doesn't," snapped Mr. McLaren. "Perhaps it would surprise you to learn," he continued, "that the seals returned long ago. One or two of them show up on the rocks every day and take a sun bath. Do you know why the rocks aren't crowded with them?" I confessed that I did not. "Because there isn't grub enough out there for them. Ordinarily the seals live on fish, but when there's a big restaurant on the cliff there is considerable refuse thrown into the water, and when Mr. Seal can get that kind of grub he quits his fish diet."

Uncle Sam Their Protector

It is interesting to learn that the seals prefer the Cliff House refuse to fish for a steady diet, for the Italian fishermen have long suspected the seals of laying a heavy tribute on the tribes that infest the waters hereabouts. More than once the fishermen have shot seals on the rocks in the hope of frightening off the whole herd, and the State Fish Commissioners have advocated the extermination of the seals in the interest of the fish market. Fortunately the seals have always been protected by public sentiment. In this connection I am pleased to announce that the law also protects them. This fact I discovered by chance a few days ago. While looking through some old copies of the Municipal Reports I came across some interesting data with reference to the seal rocks. I found that in 1863 the Legislature of this State passed an act "For the preservation of seals or sea lions within one mile of the beach or shore at Point Lobos." Under this act any person caught killing a seal may be fined not less than $25 nor more than $200. At the time of the passage of this act the Legislature granted a franchise to Charles C. Butler to maintain a bridge from the cliff to one of the rocks, but a few years later Uncle Sam took occasion to remind the State authorities that they had no jurisdiction over the rocks. In 1867 by an act of Congress the rocks were granted to the city "in trust for the people of the United States, to keep said rocks free from encroachments by man and to preserve from molestation the seals and other animals accustomed to resort there, to the end that said rocks shall continue to be a public preserve and resort for seals." Furthermore according to this act of Congress "the United States may at all times control and limit or diminish the number of seals resorting to said rocks so as to protect the fisheries and fishing industries," and also, "whenever any of said rocks or the space occupied by said rocks shall be required by the United States for the erection or maintenance of any public work, or for any other purpose then as to the rocks or space so required the provisions of this act shall terminate and the United States shall be reinvested with the full title, control and possession thereof." From all this it is evident that the seals need not worry over the hostility of the State Fish Commissioners.

A Record Feat in Building

The "coring" of the giant pillars to the main entrance of the new First National Bank Building on Montgomery street is generally regarded by engineers as by far the greatest feat of its kind ever attempted and has excited lively interest among architects and contractors not only here but in the East and in Europe. The object of the coring is to strengthen the columns by the insertion of a steel beam and is often a necessity in these days of crushingly heavy superstructures. The four pillars bored for the local bank were eighteen feet long and two feet in diameter and are easily the largest monoliths in the world to receive this treatment. When the matter of "coring" the big shafts was broached many architects, engineers and contractors declared it impracticable. So timid were many of the contractors about attempting the job that they demanded many thousands of dollars as a bonus to insure them against accidents. The boring was finally undertaken at the quarry and was finished without a flaw. Each pillar originally weighed sixteen tons and lost just one-half its weight in the process.

A Letter from Archbold

Ever since Mr. Hearst began reading the Achbold letters people have been curious to know how he got possession of them. If gratifying legitimate public curiosity is the principal function of a daily newspaper how prodigious is the incompetency of the journalism that made no effort to enlighten the people in a matter of such deep and absorbing interest. The first information that was given to the people of this city was a rehash of a story in Collier's Weekly telegraphed from New York. Yet long before this story appeared the whole truth came out in the New York Sun. In a copy of that paper which came into my possession even before Collier's was on sale in New York I found a letter from John D. Archbold himself explaining how Mr. Hearst obtained the sensational evidence which he has so deftly used for campaign purposes. Mr. Archbold's letter, which was addressed to the editor of the Sun, is as follows: "In response to many inquiries as to the theft of letters from my files the following may be made known: Over three years ago a report reached me that certain of my letters had been offered for sale to newspapers of this city, avowedly as stolen letters. Examination showed that some letters were missing and that they could only have been taken by some one not only familiar with the office details but highly trusted. The party on whom suspicion fell stoutly denied all guilt. A little later, however, a man who represented himself as acting between the thief and those to whom the letters had been sold proposed to return some of the letters for a consideration. His story was that the idea of the theft had been conceived by his brother, who had at one time been in the company's employ, and that his brother had induced the employe already suspected to accomplish the theft. According to the go-between's story, he had disposed of the letters or some of them to two men who purchased them on behalf of Mr. Hearst's newspaper, the Journal. Not only had stolen letters been thus traded for, but the thief was induced to carry off one or more letter copying books, many of whose pages he claims were photographed, other pages being removed altogether. The books in question were, the go-between said, returned after forty-eight hours. It is impossible to say how many letters were stolen and sold in this way. The thieves worked at their leisure. It is not thought necessary to say more at present or to mention names. Corroboration of the go-between's story of three years ago lay in his return of some of the correspondence at the time. The production of stolen letters by Mr. Hearst is further corroboration now. Obviously, among such a coterie, authenticity of their output is not to be lightly accepted. The opportunities for falsification, suppressing of context, distortion of passages are many.

End of a Bitter Controversy

The liveliest announcement that has come out of Goldfield in a long time is to the effect that the Florence mine will resume the payment of its regular dividends next month and that the savage and costly litigation between that company and the lessees of the Little Florence has been settled out of court. To those on the inside this means another victory for Tom Lockhart, manager of the Florence, against the secret influences that have been combating him since the big labor fight. His partner, A. D. Parker, vice-president of the Colorado & Southern Railroad, is on his way to Goldfield to hold a conference over the very promising new prospects of the property, for Florence with its extraordinary rich leases has suddenly developed into one of the few rich paying properties in Goldfield.

The Making of Two Millionaires

The rise of Parker and Lockhart, the one in railroading and the other in mining, is one of the romances of the winning of big fortunes in the West through bulldog pluck and perseverance against most trying conditions. Some eighteen years ago both men were on their uppers and working desperately for a hand-to-mouth existence; both, however, were full of that supreme confidence that impels the West to new and greater undertakings. Parker was a railroad section hand in Denver at $1.25 a day. One night he was on his way to his boarding house when he was accosted by a stranger, who said: "Say, pardner, my name is Tom Lockhart and I'm a miner and prospector. Don't you want to take a chance grubstaking me? Let's talk over a proposition." Parker said he was not making enough money to carry another man. The two men fell to discussing the chances of success. At that time Colorado was in the heyday of a great mining excitement. Denver was the center of wild speculation, all classes had caught the fever and the optimistic pair saw golden opportunity ahead providing they could find the wherewithal to do the grubstaking. At that time they couldn't dig up the necessary money, small as it was, but Parker agreed that he would hustle for a better job and a raise in wages and at the first chance he would set aside $75 a month to back Lockhart in his search for a paying mine; of this sum $25 a month was to go to Lockhart and the balance to provide for his wife while he was away. After a hard tussle Parker got the first $75 and Lockhart started on his hunt. It lasted some fourteen years. Both men faced all sorts of discouragements, with here and there a cheering find that helped to pay expenses for a while. But hope and a gritty confidence in their ultimate success never deserted the partners. By degrees Parker climbed up the ladder as a railroad man and as the years rolled by it became somewhat easier to find the money for Lockhart's grubstake.

How the Grubstake Won

Finally came the day when Lockhart joined the Tonopah rush. He located several good mines there, but sold them too quickly and others reaped the benefit. He was among the leaders in the Goldfield rush and there located the Florence, the mine that has made both himself and Parker millionaires. From the start Lockhart had all the papers drawn up in the name of the partners, Parker and Lockhart. Parker manages their joint fortune in Denver, while Lockhart looks after the development and details of their mining interests in Goldfield.

An Envoy to Olympus

Mr. Rudolph Spreckels has been lunching with the President of the United States. Any respectable American citizen can call on the President, but not every citizen, however respectable, is invited to luncheon at the White House. You may draw your own inference. Over the cold turkey and a glass of California sauterne the two statesmen discussed such important affairs of state as the proposed elimination of Francis J. Heney and Detective Burns from the graft prosecution, to assist in the prearranged conviction of John D. Rockefeller for selling Standard oil in violation of the statutes in such cases made and provided; the matter of a personal letter from his maj— from President Roosevelt to Judge Dunne boosting that Spreckels candidate for re-election; and the probability that California will indorse Emper—— President Roosevelt's plan for the Succession. Of course Mr. Spreckels denied all this when cross-examined by a reporter "at the Willard." He not only denied that he had asked the President to write a letter to Judge Dunne for publication in the prosecution organs under screaming headlines; but he expressed profound astonishment that the State secret had leaked out so quickly. He probably suspects the butler, who stood close behind his chair during the conversation relating to the Dunne letter; but one of the waiters who served during the soup course might have been a Washington correspondent for all Mr. Spreckels knows to the contrary. Anyway Judge Dunne doesn't need a letter from Kaiser Wilhelm, Czar Nicholas or the Mikado of Japan. Mr. Spreckels even went so far as to ask the reporter to mark his words that Judge Dunne will receive a bigger vote than was polled for Eugene Schmitz. What need has Judge Dunne for letters from anyone? On this authority, therefore, we may safely assume that Judge Dunne will continue to paddle his own canoe; he will receive no tow line assistance from the Roosevelt tug of State.

Behind the Arras

Mr. Spreckels was forced to admit, however, that he and the Dicta— that he and the President "talked over politics," but the matter was not of a public nature. When statesmen confer in camera their discourse is a State secret. It is not even recorded in the national archives to be culled thence by future historians for the instruction of a distant posterity. What kind of politics was discussed at that White House luncheon is known only to Mr. Spreckels, Mr. Roosevelt, the butler and God. Mr. Spreckels condescended to inform the reporter, finally, that neither Mr. Heney nor Detective Burns will be compelled to pinch down to a Government salary. This is bad news for San Francisco, but it must be endured. There is nobody in this city on sufficiently intimate luncheon terms with President Roosevelt to back fire Mr. Spreckels. Heney and Burns may continue to afflict us, for there is but one Roosevelt and Mr. Spreckels is, in this tribulation, his prophet.

Whom Spreckels Would Destroy

Then Mr. Spreckels lured the reporter into a conversation concerning the graft prosecution, and here he had the newspaperman good and tight. The reporter had sense enough to ask Mr. Spreckels if there wasn't some kind of hitch in the graft prosecution, and Mr. Spreckels promptly answered that it was a campaign lie. The prosecution was getting along all right; there was going to be no let-up; the prosecution was not doing politics since the defeat of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League; and they were going to put a lot of people in jail. The reporter was only a Washington correspondent recently promoted from the Indiana circuit assignment and therefore ignorant of national affairs. If Mr. Spreckels had been interviewed in New York where the San Francisco graft prosecution is two household words in every newspaper office, the reporter would have asked him how long the prosecution had been putting people in jail, how many people had been jailed, and how many were still at large—details that Mr. Spreckels would have been forced reluctantly to give. He would have told the reporter that the graft prosecution had been wasting itself on the desert air for more than two years; that nobody had been put in jail as yet; and that seemingly it is impossible to jail anybody even when he pleads guilty. But Mr. Spreckels is a sort of Joey Bagstock, "tough old Joe," in that, notwithstanding perennial and perpetual discouragement, he still and ever " 'as 'opes."

Diplomacy on the High Seas

Now will the busy editor improve the shining hour by writing an editorial deprecating the order from One Who Must Be Obeyed commanding that the Pacific fleet shall proceed almost forthwith to the Atlantic ocean, there to stay until it shall be demonstrated beyond the peradventure of every doubt that our honorable friends in Japan have not the slightest intention of invading us by way of Atascadero, Pescadero of Cazadero. Talk about the subtle diplomacy of Talleyrand-Perigord or the insidious foreign policies of Richelieu and Mazarin! These were but half-baked intrigues of a measly statecraft, compared with the profound wisdom here displayed by the Roosevelt administration at its latest gasp! Behold the chain of events since the Rooseveltian method of overawing the Orient and maintaining the mastery of the Pacific began to unfold itself under the red-tapery of the navy department! A battle-fleet in being, surging onward from banquet-board to banquet-board of the hospitable Latin republics; from barbecue to panoplied pomp and circumstance of street parade and eloquent speechfest of Californian gladhanderoutazipboomah; thence as the stormy petrel flies, to the blessed isles of the dusky hula dancers, where the ylang-ylang blooms and the cocktails are made of poi; and then sou' by sou' west direct to the Austral continent where the long-headed Saxon lives in eternal peace with the dog-faced Bushman there to shake hands across the sea with our cousins of Botany Bay whose ancestors came over close-fettered by the tie that binds, but where our heroes had to go ashore with guns that wouldn't shoot; still onward to the hot and frisky land of Taft where the armor-clad diplomats didn't go ashore at all, because old King Cholera was holding high revel in the walled city and on the Malacanan; and once more, this time nor' nor' west, armada-like, across the circle of Cancer to invade and conquer the tea houses of Tokio and hold other and daintier hands across the sea with the giggling geishas of Yokohama; and again breasting the monsoon of the China sea en route to Singapore and Port Said, anywhere east or west of Suez where the bayaderes are agile in the Red Bazaar and other houses of mirth; always westward hoing through the Mediterranean and other banquet-bordered seas where the towns are all wide open, only pausing to eat, drink and make merry speeches about ourselves and those who are kind to us on this long and pleasant voyage; until our battle fleet is once more at anchor at the place of beginning, like the elderly naval man who sat alone on a piece of stone where the shores that round the coast from Deal to Ramsgate span, reciting in a singular minor key:

"Oh, I am a cook, and a captain bold,
And the mate of the Nancy brig,
And a bo'sun tight, and a midshipmite,
And the crew of the captain's gig."

Where the Battle Will Be Fought

Thus the Big Stick, waving monitorially in the cryptic chancellery of Washington, casts its lambent shadow athwart the face of the earth from Hampton Roads to Plymouth Hoe, awing empires to sullen submission and making petty principalities bow the servile knee that thrift may follow fawning. This is the kind of diplomacy that counts. It may be likened to the moral suasion of the Mexican borders that preserves peace on the reservation and good will to men, but keeps its guns ready. We have frightened the Jap into good manners and our fleet may safely ride at anchor anywhere between the salons of Newport and the dance halls of the Bowery where they need the social prestige of the admirals and the red and white metal of the gun deck. Atascadero may bivouac in peace; Pescadero may chase the toothsome pompano unafraid; Cazadero may hammock in her boskage far from the madding crowd and war's alarms—there will be no invasion of the Pacific Coast by the fierce hussars and unwhiskered pandours of Nippon. There is no need for a war fleet on the Pacific. We have told the enemy that while we do not want to fight, by Jingo if we do we've got the men, we've got the ships, and we've got the money too. But let me put a flea in the deaf ear of the Boss Diplomat: It was never the intention of Japan to invade the Pacific Coast; a war fleet is indeed unnecessary on this coast as far as the Japanese are concerned, but not because the coast is safe from a warlike invasion. When Japan takes the notion to worry us with a fight they will not take the trouble to cross the ocean to open hostilities; they will make us come to them—the cock of the East will fight in his own barnyard. When Japan is ready the first blow will fall upon the Philippines and the second will land on Hawaii. Then we can do as we please; but if we resent this sort of diplomacy we will have to enter our protest under the guns of Corregidor or somewhere outside the forty-fathom line of Diamond Head. And it will take a long time to steam from Hampton Roads to the firing line. In the meantime, however, let us listen attentively to the cordial eloquence of Ito; let us applaud the brotherly sentiments of Katsura; let us shout "Banzai!" to the trade talk and commerce guff of Shibusawa. There will be no war, of course,; as long as Japan gets everything she demands; but it is quite certain that the peace of nations will not be preserved by the queer diplomacy now in process in Washington—war will not be averted by bluff, buncombe and brass band diplomacy.

Found Fortune in the East

The recent selection of Harrison Fisher, the artist, to do $3,000 "rush" work on Christmas illustrations for the Appletons, recalls the fact that some ten years ago Fisher was unable to get a position to do newspaper illustration on any of the local dailies. He was literally forced to go East in order to get work. Some time ago he was credited with making $20,000 in seven months. He easily makes $10,000 a year now, so the call of the East has proven a call to fortune in his case. Prosperous now, Fisher fell upon very hard ground when he landed in New York and for a period he encountered great difficulties, but he was full of grit and industry and buckled down to grinding work. In company with Stanlaus and several other artists down on their luck he leased a small room in the bohemian quarter and all of them led a hand-to-mouth existence for many cold, cheerless moons. All four of them have since made their mark among the top notchers.

Making "Easy Money"

When Fisher was here on his vacation a while ago he recounted several anecdotes illustrating how success begets success and incidentally furnishes ready money. The day before he left New York for California a representative of Armour, the Chicago packer, entered his studio and said that the firm was about to get out its annual calendar and wanted Mr. Fisher, among other well-known American artists, to do one of his typical woman's heads. Fisher replied that he was packing his traps to go on his first vacation, that he had planned to leave the next day, and that he wouldn't draw a head for any man at any price. "Price is no object," replied the agent, quickly, "name your figure." Fisher felt impelled to fix a price upon the drawing that would prove prohibitive and end all further discussion, so he answered "$250." "Good," replied the agent, briskly, "that's quite satisfactory. I'll make out the check right here and settle the business at once." And he did. After he had gone Fisher glanced at the check in his hand and pocketed it with a smile. Then he walked to a nearby portfolio, drew out the partly finished study of a head, bestowed several deft strokes

A Clearing House for Science

Dr. Jordan of Stanford University, Dr. Wheeler of the State University, and all the doctors of the Board of Supervisors are in favor of establishing a hospital for the city's sick poor under direction of the medical departments of the two universities. In a recent discussion of the proposition Dr. Jordan mentioned three "apparent advantages" that would accrue, namely, (1) reduction of the city's expenses; (2) the best of care for the poor sick and the sick poor; and (3) material advancement of the cause of education. I am delighted to learn from Dr. Jordan (who is a well of information undefiled) that the poor are to be utilized at last. They have been with us too long already in their unproductive capacity; it is indeed time that they were made to contribute to the wealth of our city and the sum of our medical and surgical knowledge. It was unnecessary that Dr. Jordan should assure us of the tender mercy with which the freshmen and sophomores of the university medical departments will experiment on the poor sick consigned to their empirical observation and treatment; there will certainly be no woeful waste of patients in this clinical hospital by these undergraduates, these doctors in the bud, these eager, aspiring Sangrados in embryo. But it is the economic feature of the proposition and the educational aspect of the plan that will appeal most powerfully to the practical citizen. By shifting the expense of a hospital for the unfortunate from the city to the State and the endowment fund of the Stanford University, the city will be relieved of a grievous financial burden; and the money can be used for a better purpose—some of our city officials are not yet supplied with automobiles and not all of them have access to steam launches in which to reach the summer homes across the bay after the revelries that detain them beyond the hour of "the last boat." Then there are the "educational advantages," not only to the students but to the patients themselves before and after the chloroform period of instruction. How edifying for a poor beggar suffering from some incurable disease to hear his symptoms described by the learned preceptor; to listen with interested attention while his hopeless condition is diagnosed by a wise man in spectacles; to realize at last, from such fragments of discourse as he may be able to comprehend in the mass of technical disquisition, that his "heart action" is so weak and uncertain that it is extremely doubtful if he will awake from the sleep at that moment to be imposed upon him in the fumes of the ether cup! Yes, indeed, the "education advantages" of Dr. Jordan's hospital enterprise are two-fold—it is twice blest, like the quality of mercy; it blesseth him that gives and him that takes. By all means let us give our poor to the learned doctors of the universities and the political doctors of the Board of Supervisors; for three good reasons, to wit: (1) that the city may grow rich from their elimination from the municipal budget; (2) that they may be preserved from a long life under the scalpels and potions of succeeding classes of nascent chirurgeons and novitiate pathologists; and (3) that the science of medicine may be advanced the space of an inch and a half.

Fool Prophets

I take occasion at this time to serve notice on the political prophets, the pre-election lightning calculators, and the soothsayers generally who are juggling with the election probabilities, that I am saving their figures, hoarding their prognostics, collecting their opinions, classifying their prophecies, and filing their predictions; with intent to put them all to scorn and confusion at the first opportunity after the event shall make so many monkeys of the oracles. I have never been enamored of the soothsaying person, be he a hindsight wizard or a foresight guesser; the seer has ever been an abomination in my sight and the sibyl has always been a stench in my nostrils. In my view the political prophet, though he column his "figures" a mile high and mass his "sure" and "doubtful" states in serried ranks, is of no more worth in the practical economy of human destiny than the fortune-telling hag that sells tips on a horse race from a greasy pack of cards. I am able, therefore, to predict vast sport from my bunch of political prophets as soon as the polls are fairly closed.

A Landmark To Be Restored

One of San Francisco's most venerable landmarks, one that despite fire and earthquake, the shattering of it and the consuming of its vitals, will happily serve as a link between the old San Francisco and the new, is St. Mary's Church at the corner of Dupont and California streets. A noble specimen of the Gothic style of architecture, all that remains of the grand old edifice is the shell of firmly mortared brick which has all the rugged beauty of an ancient ruin. Experts have reported that it would require full a third of the original cost of the solid walls to demolish them, and it has therefore been decided to restore the building on the original lines. The Paulist fathers have many photographs of the old interior and this will be reproduced with all its characteristic features. They are now raising money to pay the cost of reconstruction and they will be given a benefit entertainment at the American Theatre on Thursday of next week. Robert Warwick and several other professionals will take part in the performance. Among the patronesses are Mrs. M. H. de Young, Mrs. A. H. Loughborough, Mrs.

A Monument to Alemany

Old St. Mary's was for many years the Catholic Cathedral of this diocese. When in 1853 the later Archbishop Alemany was transferred from the See of Monterey to San Francisco there were but three Catholic churches in the city. These were the Mission Dolores, then far removed from the centre of population, St. Patrick's, then on the site of the Palace Hotel, and the old St. Francis, then a small and unpretentious structure. The present site of St. Mary's was then the heart of the residence district. It was donated to the church by John Sullivan and his wife, Katherine, and their remains are buried in a mortuary chapel in the old church. The cornerstone of the building was laid on July 17, 1853, and the sonorous bell rang out for the first mass on Christmas morning in 1854. For many years the old Cathedral marked the centre of San Francisco's original tenderloin. Save for one street it could be approached only through avenues lined with brothels, a circumstance that lent particular significance to the admonition to observe the hour and fly from evil which was engraved in an oblong piece of granite beneath the clock in the graceful tower. Nobody ever heard of Archbishop Alemany urging the city authorities to improve the character of his environment. He probably felt that as his church was in the midst of the fallen it was easily accessible to those who needed it the most. On the morning of the earthquake the great cross and pediment on the front of the tower fell and crushed the granite steps of the main entrance. Several pinnacles of exquisitely carved Cararra marble were broken from the Gothic altars within. No other damage was done until the fire swept along. The priests tried to save the church, but they were driven from the roof by the soldiers and at midnight of the first day the last column of flame shot from the open top of the old tower.

A Bad Risk

During the recent fire at the Bohemian Club a lot of clubmen ran into the street and eagerly scanned the roof whence the smoke was slowly curling. A passerby seeing the commotion said to Frank Goad, "What's the matter?" Mr. Goad looked ruminatively at the native before replying, "It's snowing." As this is the eighth time the fire department has been called to the Little Palace since the Bohemian Club has occupied it the insurance companies have cancelled the insurance, having decided that the club is "hot stuff" and a bad risk.

Few of those who witnessed the Warfield production of "A Grand Army Man," with its comical costumes so true to the hideous period of 1882 knew that the costumes for this play and indeed for all of the Warfield productions are designed by Albertine Randall (Mrs. Fairfax) Whelan. soon after the fire and the death of her mother, and has since been enjoying a salary of twelve thousand a year paid to her by Belasco. She designed the "Rose of the Rancho" costumes and as Belasco seems looking more and more to the West for his ideas her knowledge is of service to him. Those who know Mrs. Whelan and her whimsical sense of humor could see her deft pencil in the funny costume worn by Miss Letitia at the Grand Army reunion when the apron pockets of the ladies of the Ladies' Relief, who served the lemonade, were composed of tiny American shields. Miss Letitia herself as the Goddess of Liberty was one of the funniest sights imaginable. Hallie Andrews in her tight "pullbacks," her uncomfortable tight fur cape and her fur cap were reminiscent to many women who were the school girls of that ungraceful period.

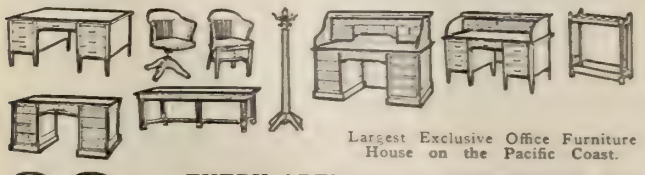
Faint Praise for Nance



Nance O'Neill is once more in New York and with a new play, one that is filled to the brim with acting, emotion, soul harrowing situations, unexpected denouements and all the other features of the true and tried drama. If Miss O'Neil expected to compel the homage of the cynical critics in this play she has again suffered disappointment, for they have not taken the play seriously. "It is a play," says one of them, "full of strong acting scenes and the dialogue teems with long speeches filled with stress and sobs and tears. It will afford pleasure to a large part of the theatre-going public and Miss O'Neil will be praised for her emotional acting in it." Thus does the Gotham critic damn with faint praise.

The Hospital Scandal

Most of the doctors in town are taking a keen interest in the big, breezy scandal that has blown the lid off the California Women's Hospital and exposed the internal works of the management. Almost every doctor you meet will tell you he is surprised that it took so long for the explosion to occur. But occasionally you will meet a doctor who will tell you he is surprised that the explosion occurred, and he will explain that he had been of the opinion that Dr. Vowinckel was too tactful a diplomat ever to permit the kindling of hostile feelings. Dr. Vowinckel is a superb strategist, as is evident from the power that he has so long enjoyed in an institution of a quasi-public character, supported in a great measure by charity. When the hospital was founded it was intended that all the physicians in the city should avail themselves of the facilities which it afforded. And for years it was a popular institution, but since the advent of Dr. Vowinckel fewer doctors than formerly have sent their patients thither. I have heard by way of explanation that the hours in which operations must be performed at the Women's Hospital make it impossible for the average doctor to attend to patients at that institution.

identity and the familiarizing of one's friends with a sign-manual which can neither be changed nor duplicated. There are disadvantages, too, for it is often convenient not to be quite sure of a signature to a document. There would be a sudden end to short memories where absolute denial is considered too risky and acknowledgment undesirable. An absolutely unimpeachable thumb mark would be worse than an unheeded injunction to "burn this letter."

THE WEEK'S FINANCIAL OUTLOOK.

By R. E. Mulcahy.

The war cloud abroad had its temporary effect and then faded away. There can be no lasting depression in American securities from causes of this character. Money will find peaceful employment, therefore trouble abroad will encourage foreign capital to seek investment in America and create a stronger demand for American food products. It is a foregone conclusion no matter what the outcome of the present conditions abroad, American securities will in no wise suffer any decline. The chief factor which will sway prices up and down for the next two weeks hinges upon the political situation which seems as certain as ever that there is only one candidate in the race. Taft has a clear walk over. We will hear some big talk in the meantime that Bryan shows gains here and there, but it will not change the result when the count is made. With Taft's election the country will start on a campaign of activity never before known, and its foundation will be solid; there will be no sky rocketing. The shake down has been most complete. The security markets have during the past week shown a remarkable undertone of strength; this shows the powers are satisfied regarding the political future. The Harriman issues have as usual carried market prices upward. Many of the leading roads are reporting good increases in their earnings. Many of the equipment companies report increased orders, also that they have conditional orders to be filled if the election goes Republican. There is from this time on only one side to the New York stock market; prices will go higher. There may be some silght recessions, but the declines will be small and will afford investors an opportunity to buy on. Union Pacific Common should sell at 200, Southern Pacific at 120, Great Northern at 200, Northern Pacific at 185, St. Paul Common at 180, Louisville and Nashville at 135. The copper stocks will do better; the demand for copper metal will show a big increase before the holidays. The demand for pig iron shows some improvement. Almost every line of trade shows a more prosperous undertone.

May Marry, Despite Parental Protest

The Butters family of Oakland might be divided into two groups—the "Butter" and the "Bread-and-Butter." In the latter classification belong the children of Mrs. Butters by her second husband, Mr. Edwards. These children have had to work for their bread and butter. Georgia Edwards, who married a Mr. Cooke, has not had a silk-lined career, and her friends are interested in the report that she is soon to marry Lieutenant-Colonel Lincoln Carmany and accompany him to his post in the Orient. Mrs. Butters has opposed the engagement, as her religious convictions do not countenance the marriage of a divorced person. She offered to settle an allowance on Mrs. Cooke that would remove the necessity of bread winning, if she would consent to remain in single blessedness. But Mrs. Cooke did not take kindly to the offer and according to her friends will soon change her name to Carmany.

Mrs. Buck has been detained unexpectedly in the Philippines and will not be able to resume her social duties here till November.

Blue Print Plans of Matrimony

Mrs. Grundy's alert eye has been trained on Mrs. Jennie Whittier Bothin for some time, and if Mrs. Bothin should for the second time slip under the yoke of matrimony Mrs. Grundy has an "I told you so" at the tip of her tongue. A young architect, who resigned his lieutenantship in the artillery, is said to have made blue print plans and specification of a happy married life which Mrs. Bothin has favorably considered and the contract will be recorded before long.

Was Surprised by the Answer

There is a tension in certain smart quarters brought about by an unwitting maid who has learned the error of her ways. Mrs. Edwin Newhall has always had a reputation for tact so that her rebuke to the wife of a well known attorney is taken as the intentional retort discourteous and society is divided on the question of whether the punishment fits the crime. The attorney's wife called at the handsome new home of the Edwin Newhalls and was told that madame was out. "I am so anxious to see the house," said the caller. "I wonder whether you could show me through?" "If you wish," responded the maid and unfolded all the original delights of the house beautiful, many of the features of which were planned by Mrs. Newhall herself, to be shown to her friends on the day that her two daughters were presented to society. The lady who thus took the first excursion without waiting to be personally conducted met Mrs. Newhall at a tea the next day and showered her with a nosegay of compliments about the house. "I hope that I did not overstep the bounds of propriety in asking the maid to show me through the house," she added. "The maid nearly lost her position through the act," coldly responded Mrs. Newhall, and a thrill ran over the tea tables at the neatness and dispatch of the rebuke.

Champions the Rebuke

Mrs. Gerald Rathbone, who was Miss Marjorie Josselyn, is one of those who outspokenly champions the rebuke. She has a similar grievance against a young lady from San Rafael who called at her apartment not long ago and asked the maid to let her explore its charms in her absence. The Rathbone's apartment is considered one of the handsomest in town. Their wedding gifts alone would lift it out of the commonplace and Mrs. Rathbone has besides some wonderful pieces of furniture which she began to collect while her engagement cups were still pouring in.

Gave Her a "Soul Kiss" at the Altar

Conservatives in society would like to have ministers instruct candidates for matrimony that "soul kisses" are not good form. At a recent fashionable wedding they were shocked to see the bridegroom and bride extend their osculatory performance into the limits of time allowed for a Nethersole kiss on the stage. Earlier in the ceremony the groom dropped the ring and when he picked it up very prettily kissed it before placing it on the bride's finger. Then she dropped her handkerchief and that was saluted in like manner by the gallant groom before handing it to his bride. Practice gives courage and by the time his turn came to deal with animate material he held the guests in suspense for several breathless seconds. This is not the first time recently that the prudish guests have seen reason to protest against the passing away of the tidy little peck of yesteryear for the delicious "soul kiss."

On To the East

Mrs. Milton Pray accompanied Mrs. Efl Walton Hedges to New York and will share her apartments on Fifth Avenue during the winter. I hear she will remain some time in the East. Mrs. Pray is a very handsome woman, with the same wealth of canary colored hair which distinguished Mrs. John Siebe, now Mrs. Largey of Montana Mrs. Pray and Mrs. Siebe used to be seen everywhere together until Mrs. Hedges' advent.

Said Commander Casey

The Milwaukee sailed into port and then sailed out again without giving the matchmakers half a chance at Lieutenant Commander Casey B. Morgan. Lieutenant Morgan is as good a fish as there is in the sea for he has a private fortune that makes his position very snug. He is related to the Van Ness family and has more than once been rumored engaged to a girl in that set. Unfortunately he has an idea and one that cannot often be tailored over to fit the average woman. She must be broad minded, a bridge expert and have as tiny ankles as ever twinkled up a ship's ladder. He is an exquisite, whose quarters on shipboard are famous in the navy. Last year at target practice the Milwaukee did not make a dent in the record and some of the junior officers authored the slogan

"Boom—one gun!
Boom—two guns!
Boom—three guns!
Three shots fired!
Not one hit!"

Never Touched the Wilson Wit

The Robert Coleman's gave a dinner at Burlingame the other night which oddly enough was a "frost." The Colemans are tremendously popular and do things handsomely so it sounds like fiction to date any of their entertainments in the glacial period. However, it is now a historical fact that the memorable night was colder than the calendar would suggest. Further chronicles must narrate that every method of heating apparatus in the house went on strike at once. The furnace sat up, sizzed and gave notice that it had quit; the fireplace refused to draw either wood or coal and the sparkling electric lights and dimly shaded candles could do little toward melting the icicles. Some of the girls put furs over their frapped shoulders and Mountford Wilson sadly lamented that he could not send a wireless to the blizzard country and order a pair of fur trousers. The dinner was a great success in spite of the freezeout.

A Bit Mixed on the Books

The other day a well known society woman rang up a Van Ness avenue book shop and ordered a perttily lettered hymnal sent to oen address and a copy of "Three Weeks" delivered to another. The bill came and was promptly paid, but happening in at the devout old lady's for whom the hymnal was ordered, the lady found that it had never been delivered. Inquiry at the book shop developed the fact that the hymnal had been ordered from the East and had not yet arrived. "You see we have so few orders for hymnals," naively explained the clerk, "but we keep up a good stock of 'Three Weeks.'"

Everybody Was Delighted

The dinner and theatre party given by Mr. Athol McBean last week was in celebration of the birthday of Miss Margaret Newhall. After the theatre supper the guests motored down to Burlingame chaperoned by the Lawrence Scotts, and it considered plausible that Cupid rode postillon with the chauffeur.

Among the Illuminati of Alameda

Alameda society is presenting a number of "candidates for illumination." In other words a psychic wave called the Doctrine of Physical Immortality has rolled into the little town and tucked up its feet under some very important door mats. A Madame de Something is priestess of the cult, and her remarkable personality has evidently made an impression upon a number of women. To be a "candidate for illumination" is to understand the laws of life that the body shall become etheralized and be one with the soul. So, at least, one of the ardent pupils puts it, but I am wondering whether the real explanation of a "candidate for illumination" might not be found in the answer to the riddle, "Why is a commuter?"

Mrs. Pillsbury's Will

It was not until after the death of Mrs. Evans S. Pillsbury that any except their most intimate friends knew of the very ardent sentimental relation which had bound them. Every day from the day of his marriage Mr. Pillsbury sent to his wife, just at the noon hour, a bunch of lillies of the valley. These were Mrs. Pillsbury's favorite flowers and she always wore them. In her will, which was singularly fair and discriminating, Mrs. Pillsbury left her home in Montecito, of which she was inordinately fond, to her husband. Her jewelry and wearing apparel except a pearl necklace given her by Mr. Pillsbury, she left to her mother and the pearl necklace to Mr. Pillsbury's only granddaughter, Olivia Pillsbury, eldest child of the Horace Pillsburys. After remembering generously all the orphan asylums and the Children's Hospital, which always get the bulk of the bequests, Mrs. Pillsbury made a small bequest to her sister-in-law, bequeathed her San Mateo property, which was part of the old Kohl homestead, to her brother, and then divided the remainder of her real and personal property among her husband, brother and mother.

Honors for the Season's Debutantes

Miss Helen Jones will be formally introduced to society at a large tea to be given by her mother, Mrs. Clinton Jones, at her home in Buchanan street, on November 7th. The dainty young lady will be assisted by a number of matrons as well as by the other debutantes of the season.

A number of debutantes have been invited by Miss Louise Boyd to an informal luncheon at her home, Maple Lawn, in San Rafael. The motif of the occasion is Miss Alice Oge, who recently returned from Europe and who is to be introduced to society this winter. The guests of the occasion will be Miss Lolita Burling, Miss Clara Allen, Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick, Miss Elizabeth Woods, Miss Kate Brigham and Miss Harriet Alexander.

Reception to Miss Fleming

A dinner and reception was given at the Hotel Victoria last Sunday evening in honor of Miss Gertrude Fleming, the fifteen year old girl whose marvelous voice has gained her the title of "Child Patti." Covers were laid for fifteen. The entire lower floor of the hotel was thrown open for the reception which followed. During the evening an impromptu entertainment was given in the banquet hall. Charles Turner, the artist, acted as director and a very good program of song, music and recitation was given by the clever guests. Miss Fleming, as the star of the occasion, rendered several difficult selection which showed the wonderful range and high quality of her voice. Miss Fleming will leave the last of the month for Paris, where she will become the pupil of the great tenor, Jean de Reszke.

Still Harping on the Marriage

The visit of Prince George of Wales to Canada has been the occasion for the sentimentalists to resurrect the story of his early marriage to Miss Seymour, daughter of the British admiral, and to indulge in speculations as to what ought to have been, and why fish is flesh and flesh fowl where royal blood is concerned. The simple, fact is that Prince George of Wales had broken a specific law of England in contracting his secret marriage, and no amount of publicity or acknowledgement on his part would have altered that verity. It is possible, although extremely improbable, that neither he nor the young lady were aware of the specification of the Royal Marriage Act, passed in 1872, which expressly forbade a descendant of the King to contract matrimony without the royal consent. At the time that Prince George entered upon his "experimental marriage" there was no immediate prospect of his suceeding to the throne. Queen Victoria was in vigorous health, and there intervened both the present king and Prince Edward, Duke of Clarence, through whose children the line of succession would have been diverted.

The Wife Liberally Provided For

The plain ugly truth is that the union, or whatever one may choose to call it, which was in existence between Prince George and the daughter of his chief in the naval service was not marriage under the English law, and there was only a remote chance that the disabilities could be overcome under the most favorable circumstances. Circumstances were anything but favorable, for, as all the world is aware, Prince Edward died on the eve of his marriage and Queen Victoria, determined to provide liberally for her favorite relative, issued her mandate to Prince George to step into his dead brother's place, and there was no choice but for him to obey. Other monarchies provide that a member of the royal family who marries below his rank may set aside his morganatic wife, or if he proves more loyal than the average, forego his title and expectations. The English prince is given no alternative. There is no marriage recognized and the woman in the case has no standing before the law. As a matter of fact, Miss or Mrs. Seymour, as she was called, was liberally provided for during her lifetime, and the future of the children secured. They will be a charge on the exchequer as long as they sur-

The chances are, however, that there is an ironclad contract which will prevent them from trading on their royal connection a sRex-Norman, Rex-Georges, Rex-Guelphs, or any similar aliases, and it is not too much to expect that they may possess enough native good sense to know that they are well off indeed and accept their lot with becoming dignity and thankfulness.

Innovation at the Hotel Manx

The table d'hote dinner, ever popular in San Francisco, has been inaugurated at the new Hotel Manx by Manager Kellar and promises to be one of the distinct novelties of the fall season. Chef Burgomeister, lately of the Ritz in Paris and the St. Regis in New York, is at the head of the dining room and kitchen, which assures unusual excellence in the preparation and service of the dinners. This innovation has been made in order that discriminating diners and others may see the new hostelry and become familiar with its advantages. The Manx is located at O'Farrell and Powell streets, just one block below Union Square.

Comes Here to Beautify Homes

Doubtless the cultured element in this city who delight in artistic interiors have heard of the remarkable success of Miss Elsie de Wolfe of New York in this line of work. This original young woman without question stands at the head of her profession today. The first work of note to which her name was attached was the famous Colony Club of New York City, designed by the late Stanford White. The interior decoration of this club embodies elegance, simplicity and comfort. Among many beautiful residences in the country upon which she is now engaged are the Duke house in New York, the Ogden Armour house in Chicago, Senator George S. Nixon's house in Nevada, the residence of Samuel Newhouse in Salt Lake City, and the W. H. Crocker house in Burlingame. It is of interest and pleasure to know that Miss de Wolfe has opened a branch office in San Francisco to handle her work here on the coast, and will be represented here by Mrs. Edgar de Wolfe, who has studied in Europe for some years and is admirably equipped for beautiful work of this character.

Social Spotlight

Mr. and Mrs. William S. Tevis are at their Burlingame home for a month, after which they will visit their Bakersfield ranch.

Mrs. Henry F. Allen returned from Europe last week and has taken a home in Lyon street.

The engagement is announced of Miss Frances Helen Trent, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Lamartine C. Trent, to Harold M. Power, a mining man.

Mrs. Manana Coyle left last week for Europe to visit her aunt, who is seriously ill in London. She expects to return by Christmas.

Mr. and Mrs. M. H. Hecht of New York have taken apartments at the St. Francis for the winter.

Mrs. Alfred Hunter Voorhies will leave for the East next week. She goes as a delegate from the Albert Sidney Johnson Chapter, U. D. C., to the National Convention, which is to be held in Atlanta, Georgia.

Mrs. Jerome Lincoln and Miss Edith Lincoln will leave this week for a visit of a few weeks in New York.

Mrs. John Boyd of San Rafael and Mrs. Lawrence Poole will leave this week on a short visit to New Cork.

Mr. and Mrs. A. Starr Keeler have returned from the East and have taken the Harrison Dibblee home in San Rafael for the winter.

The Army and Navy have formed a little colony at the St. Francis and add materially to the evening color in the foyer. In the past few days there have arrived Captain and Mrs. George Reed, U. S. M. C., Mrs. George Grant Mitchell, wife of Lieutenant Commander Mitchell, U. S. N., and Miss Elizabeth Mitchell; Captain David T. Cordray, U. S. A.; E. C. Hammer, J. S. Beecher, Lieutenant and Mrs. R. The afternoon tea which was inaugurated last week in the beautiful Laurel Court of the Fairmont Hotel has jumped into fashionable popularity from its inception. With its crowds of handsomely gowned women, charming debutantes and buds, it takes one back to the days in the Palm Garden of the old Palace. It also presents just such a sight as may be seen any afternoon in the Orangerie of the Astor, New York, or in the tea room of the Plaza.

Among the arrivals at the Tamalpais Tavern last week were: David S. Buchanan, J. A. Rogers, Mrs. E. Davis, Mr. and Mrs. G. E. Wells, Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Odd Things in the World

Ideals in Boys and Girls

An interesting communication is made to the Brussels Archives de Phychologie by M. Varendonck, a Belgian school teacher, who has collected and classified answers from 800 children of Ghent to the question what person they admired most, with the object of gaining an insight into a child's ideality. It appears that up to the age of seven the great majority of children admired their father or their mother most. After that age a sudden change sets in and at the age of nine the number of little parent worshippers has undergone a reduction of sixty per cent. At the age of thirteen only one child remained out of 100 for whom father or mother still represented the ideal of perfection. Eight-year-old children possessed no historical or legendary heroes; those they admired most being persons of their own surroundings. Girls were especially enthusiastic in their admiration of such persons up to the age of twelve. At thirteen a sudden revulsion was noted, and only four per cent of the girls remained who still found their ideal in some person of their own set. Boys, on the contrary, did not change with such rapidity. While ninety-six out of 100 girls of thirteen confessed themselves as completely disillusioned as regards their former idols, forty-seven out of 100 boys of the same age had remained true to them. Another interesting point is the sex of these idols. In early youth girls admire women and boys men, although even at the age of eight the inquirer found still ten per cent of the boys idolizing women. This percentage grew gradually smaller until at thirteen ninety-nine out of 100 boys had forsaken their woman idol for a man, living, historical or legendary. The girls on the other hand, became almost without exception confirmed man worshippers from their twelfth year.

Ingenious Act of Revenge

An act of revenge hard to beat for impish ingenuity has been committed, according to a Berlin message, by an Italian laborer working on the great tunnel which the Grand Ducal Government of Baden is constructing through the Black Forest mountains. Actuated by some grievance, he altered the position of a row of stakes, and when the excavators, who were working upon two sections of the tunnel, approached from the north and south, were about to complete the connecting bore they found to their astonishment that instead of the sections being directed to the same point they were twenty-six feet apart. The northern half of the tunnel will now have to be resurveyed entirely, while an expensive series of supports will be required to sustain the framework already built but now useless. The expense is estimated at $875,000.

The Latest Musical Prodigies

News of the latest thing in musical prodigies comes from Berlin. The Berlinos, aged nine, five and four, and playing the piano, violin and violincello, having conquered the Kaiser, are considered certain this winter to take London by storm. The mother, a German by birth, married an American and lived in New York till her husband's death. She then returned to Berlin for the sake of her childrens' musical education. The general intendant of the royal theatres having heard of them induced the Kaiser to send for them. Baby Clarence, a born democrat, gravely saluted the Emperor with a "Good day, dear brother," to which the Emperor replied with a hearty laugh. He was so impressed with their performance on piano, violin and 'cello that he commanded them to appear before him for a second recital, and afterward presented the mother with 1,500 marks and offered to her free of cost the Royal Opera House for their first public concert, which is to take place next session. In addition to this he gave them free admission to the Royal High School of Music, where they will receive further musical instruction.

"Graustark" at the Valencia

"The Prisoner of Zenda" pioneered an attractive way for the modern romancer when he turned his perilous course through the petty kingdoms of modern Europe. His exploits opened up a field that had lain fallow through several literary periods, a field superlatively attractive whenever the fanciful mind of the world turns to the extravagant in adventures and in love. "Graustark," a dramatization of Robert Barr McCutcheon's well thumbed romance, offered a splendid vehicle for the Valencia stock company in an action of this character, as was attested by the warm reception with which it was greeted. That the courting of a Queen by a strenuous, red-blooded American adventurer was somewhat incongruous apparently made no difference to the sympathetic, generous audience. "Amuse your audience" is the watchword of the present popular school of playwrights, led by William Somerset Maugham, the London rival of Clyde Fitch as producer of box office successes. Measured by this dictum the production of "Graustark" certainly won its way on the score of its love story alone. By all the rules of the game, neglected by Homer and the troubadours but mangled into use by the authors of the "six best sellers," the action careened along its thrilling way at full and sure swinging passionate pace to the captivating climax—where the venturesome hero mounted the throne in the empty room to make love to the Princess on the historical chair from which her royal ancestors had delivered their edicts. Time was when the top of romantic endeavor was reached the moment the king courted the simple beggar maid, as in the good old ballad, but the resourceful up-to-date author is more original and a far better business man; he modernizes the action and captures the enthusiasm of his audience by portraying a hustling, free born American hero pausing long enough in his rush to fame and fortune to raise a lovesick Queen to his own proud estate. Mr. Warwick possesses the personal address and the manner to shine in this sort of role. He expresses a warm sentiment, an impressive earnestness and a daring spirit in his love-making in these transcendentally romantic scenes that appeals in a particularly nice fashion to the candied taste of the discriminating matinee girl. Tales still slumber in his old home here to the effect that he took a course in Cupid's court before he went East to study for the stage. Thereby he very prudently followed the adage of the French school: Get experience in life before you attempt to express feelings on the stage. Miss Willette Kershaw was attractive as the Queen and played the role with her commendable skill, a skill that renders her unusually valuable in an all-round stock company.

"Checkers" Again at the Van Ness

"Checkers" will be the attraction at the Van Ness Theatre for one week, beginning Monday night, and its return will be welcomed by the many theatregoers who enjoyed the comedy last year. The play is unique, a story of American life told in a crisp, clean cut dialogue, with cleverly devised situations and one scene with a thrill that leaves the audience breathless. The hero is named Campbell, but nobody ever calls him that. He is "Checkers" from the moment he appears in the rotunda in a Hot Springs hotel till the last act curtain leaves him with his sweetheart in his arms. He is a gentleman sport, spending his money as he chooses until he meets "Pert" Barlow and hears her beg Arthur Kendall, the dissipated son of the rich Clarksville merchant, to come home. Incidentally he finds out how a sport looks to a girl like Pert and turns his back squarely on his old life. The second act finds him in Clarksville clerking in the Kendall store and adoring Pert without hope. In one of the daintiest and quaintest love scenes ever played he finds out that Pert cares for him, and her father sends him away, refusing consent to his suit till Checkers can show $5,000, earned in a year. What Checkers does to get the money and what he does with the money when he gets it develops two acts of unflagging interest. The management of "Checkers" has kept the original company intact as far as possible. Hans Robert plays "Checkers" again this year, and Dave Braham "Push" Miller. Lydia Dickson still has the role of Cynthy, the laughter compelling servant girl, and "Pert," "Checkers" sweetheart, is played this year by Helen Ormsbee.

Sparkling Comedy at the Valencia

The last performance of "Graustark" will be given at the Valencia Theatre Saturday afternoon and evening and at the Sunday matinee "His Excellency, the Governor," will have its first stock presentation in San Francisco. This delightful light comedy is by Captain Robert H. Marshall, the English officer who discovered several years ago that his pen was sharper than his sword and took to playwrighting as a permanent occupation. The action of the comedy takes place on an island in the South Pacific, and governed by a very serious gentleman, Sir Montague Martin. The governor is about to receive a visit of inspection from one of his superiors, who comes to the island with his mother and sister. A steamship puts in unexpectedly and Sir Montague also receives an unexpected call from a distant cousin, Stella de Gox, a French connection who has taken up the concert hall stage as a profession. Her arrival at this critical time annoys the Governor, but he is forced to receive her and introduce her as the Countess de Gox. Just at this time a yellow flower, the aloe, bursts into bloom, and a yellow dust pervades the island. According to a native legend this makes everybody fall in love and instantly a series of affairs of the heart between oddly assorted couples complicates matters. Robert Warwick will have a capital part as the Governor and Miss Willette Kershaw will find a most congenial role in Stella de Gox. Commencing at the Sunday matinee Herman Heller, the distinguished violinist and director, with an orchestra of picked men, will furnish the music at the Valencia Theatre. The management feels assured that the entre act music will be the best in the city. The critical competition inaugurated last Sunday afternoon at the Valencia is meeting with high favor among the patrons. On blank forms, distributed by the ushers, criticisms on the performance are solicited from patrons, and those esteemed the best entitle the writer to a handsome cash reward. Last Sunday a prize of $25,one of $15, another of $10 and ten of $1 were awarded fortunate writers. "His Excellency, the Governor," will also be open for criticism at the Sunday matinee.

Blanche Arral Will Positively Sing on Sunday

The twice postponed concert with grand orchestra by Blanche Arral will positively be given this coming Sunday afternoon, October 25th, at the Van Ness Theatre. The artist is fully recovered and the impresario expects her to make a sensational success. The remarkable program of five grand arias with orchestral concert will be given as originally announced and Mme. Arral will sing selections with piano accompaniment and one number with flute obligato played by Louis Neubauer. Musical Director Steindorff has selected an orchestra of exceptional talent for the occasion. The great "Mad Scene" from Hamlet will be given in its entirety. Mr. Greenbaum desires to express his thanks for the kindness and patience shown him in the many difficulties that have beset this event and he hopes the public will be more than repaid by the excellence of the concert.

The Beringer Musical Club Concert

The Beringer Musical Club, under the direction of Professor and Madame Joseph Beringer, will give its ninth piano and vocal recital, Tuesday evening, October 27th, at Lyric Hall. The latter will play Mozart-Liszt's Don Juan Fantasie, one of the most difficult and fascinating compositions of modern pianoforte literature.

Stirring Drama at the Alcazar

"Strongheart," best of the plays of college life, will be the Alcazar's next offering, commencing Monday night. Its serious theme, unobtrusively sustained throughout the four acts, is the impossibility of the dominant white race meeting the civilized red man on a footing of social equality. We may educate him and treat him as one of ourselves, but if he presumes to woo or wed one of our women folk he finds the line drawn. In the play Strongheart is the son of an Indian chief and by his innate manliness has earned the esteem of his fellow students at Columbia College. He is the most valued member of the football team and in his studies none of his fellows outstrip him. In all situations where his manhood is tested it shines resplendently, yet when he falls in love with the sister of one of them and she gives her heart to him the racial barrier is raised. His patience and philosophy have been sorely tried when a messenger from his people arrives with the intelligence that by his father's death he has been made chief. As the laws of his tribe prohibit a chief marrying a Caucasian he bows to the decree and goes to rule in semi-savagery. Bertram Lytell will have the title part, which was created by Robert Edeson and played here a year ago by Ralph Stuart, with Evelyn Vaughan, the Alcazar's new leading woman, as the girl in the case. She will have the same role in the coming production, and all the other Alcazar favorites will be suitably cast.

Program of the Minetti Quartet

The Minetti String Quartet announces the first concert of its sixteenth season to take place at 3:15 p. m. Friday, November 6th, at Century Hall, Sutter and Franklin streets. The program will be as follows: Haydn, String quartet in D major, op. 20, No. 4; Bach, Duo for two violins and piano accompaniment; Beethoven, string quartet in F major, op. 18. Miss Marie Storey, pianist.

Concert by the Conservatory of Music

An interesting concert will be given by the pupils of the San Francisco Conservatory of Music under the direction of Professor E. S. Bonelli at Christian Science Hall on Thursday evening, October 29th. The varied program is made up of promising selections for the piano, violin and voice. The pupils and their friends are enthusiastic over the affair and no pains will be spared to make it a great success.

Kolb and Dill at the Princess

Next week will mark the appearance of Kolb & Dill at the Princess, in their latest success, "Playing the Ponies." The story of "Playing the Ponies" is admirable in its humor. Kolb and Dill appear as two Germans, Pluckus and Pickus, who in previous years formed an enduring partnership and have increased their capital from "half of nothing" to "something," till they are "bankers and brokers." In their "salad" days they both entered into matrimony at the same time and by a coincidence each of their wives died after giving birth to a son. Both children were placed in the same cradle and one of them died. As the surviving boy grew up he became the subject of great controversy to Pickus and Pluckus, as neither of them was able to decide whose son he was. Finally the boy ran away and joined a racing stable owned by Tom McGinnis, where he becomes a protege of his employer, takes his name and turns out to be a crack jockey. Vera Montfort, an adventuress and race track follower, makes desperate love in turn to Pickus and Pluckus, and wheedles each of them out of his cash, diamonds and bank book, leaving them broke. They start out on a still hunt for her and also for their runaway son. They disguise themselves as policemen and all kinds of comical situations ensue. After a stormy scene with Miss Montfort Pickus and Pluckus arrive at a modus vivendi and everything ends satisfactorily. Kolb and Dill will have the advantage of the support of an excellent eastern company. The cast will be as follows: Pluckus and Pickus, C. William Kolb and Max M. Dill;

Capital Features at the Orpheum

The Orpheum program for next week will contain five new acts, all of which are of exceptional merit. Miss Hope Booth, a remarkably clever and winning actress will present George M. Cohan's bright and snappy comedy, "The Little Blonde Lady." Mr. Cohan has provided Miss Booth with a role that fits her to a nicety. It is that of a young authoress who fears being roasted by a dramatic critic and who secures a position as his stenographer. After fascinating him by her conversation and brilliancy she reveals her identity and a favorable notice of the play is the result. Another particularly entertaining feature of the coming program will be Valadon, recently the associate of the famous Kellar and for five years a sensation at the Egyptian Hall, London, where he produced a series of startling illusions. Lewis and Green will present a laughable sketch, entitled, "Engaging a Cook," by Oscar Lewis, which is full of witty and pointed dialect, humorous complications and several very catchy numbers. McPhee and Hill, skillful aerialists, will present an original act entitled "The Clown and the Tired Man," which is a combination of laughs and thrills. Black and Jones, colored eccentric dancing comedians, will also contribute to the success of the program. Next week will be the last of Redford & Winchester, La Petite Mignon and of Lyster Chambers and Clara Knott in the thrilling sketch, "The Operator."

"Monna Vanna" Turned Into Opera

"Monna Vanna" has been made into an opera, with music by Henri Fevrier, and is announced for production at the Paris Opera immediately following "Gotterdammerung," but Maurice Maeterlinck has raised his usual objection—an objection which has always made difficulties when his plays are staged as operas. He insists that the title role be sung by his wife, Georgette Le Blanc. In spite of the bad feeling, the directors of the Opera have decided to mount the work in October, as originally planned, with Mme. Maeterlinck. This is the third time that the author has insisted on having his wife as the interpreter of his ideas. First it was when Claude Debussy set "Pelleas et Melisande" to music. When Maeterlinck found that Mary Garden was to have the title role in the production of the opera at the Opera Comique he promptly wrote an open letter to the Paris papers disclaiming all responsibility for the work and hoping that it would be a failure. When his "Ariadne et Barbe-Bleue" was produced at the Opera Comique, Michel Carre, the director, yielded, and Mlle. Le Blanc sang the title role. As the composer of "Monna Vanna" prefers Mlle. Breval as his interpreter, it is likely that Maeterlinck may express himself violently again.

Early Works of Wagner Brought to Light

Following the recent resurrection of Richard Wagner's unknown opera, "The Wedding," German musical explorers now have brought to light four of the great composer's hitherto practically unfamiliar overtures, written during what is described as Wagner's overture period, which ran between the years 1830 and 1839. Two of the most interesting compositions among the four are entitled "Christopher Columbus" and "Rule Britannia." The first-named was played to the great delight of those who heard it by the Chemnitz Philharmonic Orchestra. It is described as abounding in powerful passages interpretative of the longing of men of Columbus's time for new worlds and new civilizations, which resulted in the discovery of America, the land of the future. The other political work, "Rule Britannia," Wagner wrote at Konigsburg in 1838, while eking out a wretched existence as the leader of a local theatre orchestra. In addition to these original manuscripts there also has been found a memorandum in Wagner's own handwriting which contains the remarkable statement that he was so poor that he lacked funds for postage with which to procure the return of the two overtures from Paris and London, where he had sent them for possible publication.

D'Albert's New Opera "Iseyl"

Eugen d'Albert has altered only the title of the play Armand Sylvestre wrote for Sarah Bernhardt and will call his opera "Iseyl" instead of "Izeyl," as he considers his spelling more euphonious. The plot will give opportunity for brilliant spectacle, as the action passes in India three centuries before the Chirstian era and is a thinly disguised version of the legend of Buddha. A young prince, who with his colleagues is devoted to the courtesan Izeyl, robs the temple of the sacred tripod that he may present it to her. Indignant at such sacrilege, the people demand that she be punished. The reigning princess, mother of the young man, answers that courtesans are not to be honored with punishment, merely despised. Izeyl swears to revenge herself on the princess as the first act closes. The second act shows the coronation of the new ruler of the land. A yogi appears and warns the people against the futility of all earthly ambitions. The ruler hearkens to his word and follows the saint into the desert. To bring him back to the pleasures of this life Izeyl goes after him into the wilderness. But she too is converted to a hatred of her own life. She repulses all lovers. One alone refuses to go and in a struggle she kills him. He is the thief of the tripod. His mother, the princess, condemns Izeyl to be buried alive. As she is about to be sealed in the tomb the ruler who renounced his kingdom returns to find Izeyl. The only earthly feeling in his breast is his love of her, but he comes back only to have her die in his arms.

Auto Notes

A business move of considerable interest to the automobile trade of California has been inaugurated by Charles S. Howard of the Howard Automobile Company of this city. Mr. Howard has controlled agency for the Buick automobiles in Northern California for the past two years and has met with wonderful success. He has now secured the agency for this popular line of machines for Southern California and will hereafter control the entire State. The Buick line was heretofore handled in Southern California by the Western Motor Car Company of Los Angeles. Mr. Howard will open a sales agency and garage in the City of the Angels immediately after the first of November.

With the demonstrating car only sixty days in the city, the Pioneer Automobile Company report the number of sales for the Chalmers-Detroit cars as having passed the 150 mark. This is more than twice the number of sales of the same date last season, and is looked upon by the local representatives of the Chalmers-Detroit cars as being the best proof of the return of good times.

Mr. A. Dalton Harrison has just returned from Europe and he reports a very successful trip of some 6218 miles with a light six Stevens Duryea six cylinder car.

F. A. Gilley of the Gilley-Schmid Company of this city enjoyed a mid-week excursion to Mount Hamilton in his Buick White Streak. He was accompanied by two friends and excellent time was made from San Jose to the summit of the mountain.

The Consolidated Motor Car Company report the sale of a '09 Franklin "G" touring car to W. H. Lawrence of the Spring Valley Water Company. Mr. Lawrence has been the user of a Franklin car for several seasons past.

A fast trip from Los Angeles has just been accomplished by Thomas H. B. Varney and family in their 60 h. p. Thomas car. Leaving Los Angeles Saturday morning the local motorist arrived here Sunday night. Good roads most of the way allowed of the terrific pace which the tourists accomplished. This was especally true on the roads north of Santa Barbara where the big Thomas car showed at times as high as sixty-five miles an hour. Varney says his machine stood the trip fine.

Mr. J. J. Bullock has purchased a new '09 Stevens Duryea car, which he is using in his campaign work for Judge of San Mateo County.

W. F. Hunt of San Jose spent the major part of the week in this city. He made the journey from and to his home in his Buick White Streak, being accompanied by his friend, Mr. O'Brien.

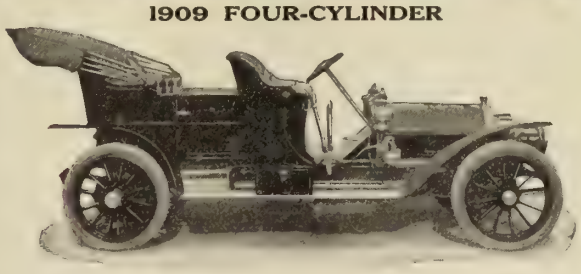
Senator Bob Douglas of Nevada, probably the best known motorist of the sagebrush country, arrived here last week. Douglas, who has owned and driven a 40 h. p. Thomas-Detroit car for two years, reports the conditions for motoring in Nevada as being favorable only for high powered cars. "I have driven my car over ten thousand miles," said Douglas, "and it is still running fine." According to Douglas there were few cars sold in Nevada last year owing to to the financial stringency, but he looks for a better season next year, a number of high-grade cars being booked for prominent mining men.

A Pope Hartford touring car has been ordered of the Consolidated Motor Car Company by W. G. Richard of Oakland. Shipments of Hartford cars will begin arriving about the middle of November.

Valentine G. Hush, who is well known in San Francisco and Oakland, and who has been located in Nevada in the mining district for the past three years, has associated himself with the sales department of the Pioneer Automobile Company, with headquarters in San Francisco and Oakland.

One of the best known motorists in this part of the State is S. H. Johnson, who has just placed an order for a sixty horse power Thomas 1909 car. Johnson has owned several cars in the past ten years and has in that time toured every part of California. This is his second Thomas car.

Mr. and Mrs. Claus Stacy, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis and Miss Lewis of Claremont left Friday for a run through Sonoma and Napa counties in Mr. Lewis' Oldsmobile. Their route will be limited to Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Ruttierford, Napa, Vallejo and way towns.



An impromptu exhibition of speed was given Wednesday on the Oakland Boulevard by E. Bullis and the 60 h. p. Thomas Flyer. The transbay representative of the Pioneer Automobile Company had a prospective customer out in the 1909 model of the Thomas car, and was requested to turn her loose. According to Bullis he let her out until the speedometer reached the sixty-five mile an hour mark, when his people became nervous and said that they were perfectly satisfied the car could go.

Sacramento is rapidly becoming an automobile center, according to S. M. Phillips, representative in that place of the Chalmers-Detroit and Thomas lines of cars. Phillips reports having placed eleven orders for Chalmes-Detroit machines in the last sixty days. He took a 40 h. p. Detroit-Chalmers Roadster home with him and shipped four of the 30 h. p. cars for immediate delivery.

to which he lives up to his own sentiments. In this connection it must be borne in mind that landlordism, as Henry George called it, is a factor in the economics of a community as much to be reckoned with as a corporation dealing in water or light. It is an axiom of political economy that high rents for land means low wages for labor. When the landlord takes the lion's share of profits he raises the price of commodities and reduces the wages of employees. It was said by one of Henry George's disciples—the late Kate Kennedy—that the devastation produced by the ravages of a barbarous invasion are insignificant in comparison to the misery entailed on humanity by the persistent robbery of landlordism. Mr. Phelan is getting from his stores an average of $70 per front foot, and what he expects to get from the upper floors may be estimated from the fact that his pull at Washington, through obvious San Francisco connections, as I have learned, has obtained Uncle Sam as a tenant for him on the top floor at an annual rental of $25,000. The whole floor is to be occupied by the Army Department. Before the fire Mr. Phelan was receiving an average of $50 per front foot for the ground floor. It is supposed that property increases in value as a result of the increase of population, but not so in the case of Mr. Phelan's property. This magic property has probably increased in value on the same principle on which the property of that other vampire—the Water Company—increased after the fire. What the principle is I have no means of ascertaining, and in my ignorance I can only feebly speculate. It may be said that while I have a right to speculate, to make complaint I have none. In this dictum I do not concur. I have as much right to protest against the rapacity of landlordism which is bound to raise the price of living, not to mention anything worse, as Mr. Phelan has to demand that a public service corporation be compelled to reduce its rates. If I be asked why I single out Mr. Phelan I shall make answer that Mr. Phelan has singled himself out. In this era of prosperous landlordism Mr. Phelan stands conspicuous in a class by himself. He has set the pace for all other property owners in the retail business district. While Mr. Phelan is charging $70 a front foot in the building at the gore of O'Farrell and Market, the owners of the building at the gore of Ellis and Market are charging $37.50 a foot. For store space in the Pacific Building at Fourth and Market streets, which has the enormous depth of 145 feet, the tenants are paying $38 per front foot. In a substantial building on Market opposite the Phelan building the price charged is $33 per front foot. One of the choicest corners in San Francisco is at Post and Kearny, formerly occupied by the White House. This property was recently leased at $50 a front foot for the ground floor. The store in the Calleau building at Geary and Grant avenue is to pay $30 per front foot. The White House lease for the property at Sutter and Grant avenue calls for $30 per front foot.

A shrewd capitalist informed me the other day that though the rents were very high throughout the retail district, the weaker merchants who had to meet the exorbitant demands or go out of business will be able to pull through all right because the city is greater than ever and will soon be booming as never before. He admitted that in many cases landlords have demanded for their property every dollar which their tenants can at present earn beyond the margin absolutely necessary to cover expenses. But my capitalist friend is a fine optimist. He says that while rents are being established on prospective values the many leases that have been made attest a firm confidence in the future of the city. Therefore the landlord who is responsible for this expression of confidence should be felicitated.

New National Hymn

King Leopold recently commissioned the composer Gervaert to write a national hymn for the inhabitants of the Congo State. Gervaert begged to be relieved of the responsibility on the ground that such a song must arise from some crisis in the lives of the people and that to compose deliberately what shall be the hymn of a nation was not easy to do. The King of the Belgians insisted that he do his best and the result is said to be a much better national anthem than the Congo Free State deserves. It was recently performed in public under the title "Expansion Belge." The composer used as its main theme an air taken from one of his earlier cantatas, which was originally founded on an old Flemish folk song, and is therefore admirably suited to its present purpose.

anism. Marco Pole, the greatest traveler of his time, who visited China and spent many years at the court of Kubla Kahn, the son of Genghis Kahn, declared it to be the most brilliant and luxurious court in the world.

For many centuries the Turks and their kindred were a terror to Europe and contemporaneous European writers naturally represented them as enemies to the human race. As soldiers these old Turks have never been surpassed. They were brave as the bravest, perfectly amenable to discipline, admirably organized, and capable, under great leaders, of conquering the world. The race has given to the world its full share of great men, who could not only conquer great empires but rule them. Although they were originally nomads of different religions, no race has ever developed a stronger national feeling. They finally accepted Mohammedanism, but they never loved the Arabs or the Persians, never rested until they had a Turkish Caliph. They adapted themselves to the civilization of China, Persia and other countries which they conquered, but it cannot be said they made any general contribution to the civilization of the world. They have given us nothing which is peculiarly Turkish.

One of the most astute students of the East, a man who has given fifty years to watching the changes of Turkey, had this to say two years ago regarding conditions there: "Two hundred years ago Count Choiseul made a report to Louis XIV that the Ottoman Empire was tottering on its base and yet it still exists (1906). Nobody doubts that the empire is shaken to its very foundations and the tottering edifice is held up mainly by two pillars, the strength and soundness of which do not depend exclusively on the Turks themselves, but rather upon their fierce enemies, who very naturally, are bent upon a steady weakening and final removal of these means of security. The first of these props is the rivalry of the Foreign Powers and neighbors of Turkey in Europe and Asia, who owing to the fat morsel which has kept their mouths watering for centuries, will hardly permit any one of them to become the heir of the deceased. It is often assumed that England, having got possession of Egypt, Malta and Cyprus, will not care much about Constantinople, and that her rivalry with Russia on this point has ceased to exist. But this is quite a mistake. It is not Constantinople alone but the mastery of the Mediterranean which forms the bone of contention. England will hardly acquiesce in a Russian occupation of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles, still less will Italy, France and Austro-Hungary remain indifferent to the arrival of a new power in these waters. As regards Turkey's land neighbors it requires a large measure of naivete to imagine that Austro-Hungary and Russia have renounced forever their old aspirations for ascendency in the regions bordering upon the Ottoman Empire. An extraordinary change will and must take place as soon as the question of mine and thine comes to the fore, when the pacificators of today (1906) will be found at each other's throats.

"The second pillar which holds up the tottering empire is the lack of unity and national aspirations which characterize the various non-Turkish elements which make up the population of the Empire. Although these various nationalities are one in their hatred of the common enemy, they are quite at variance and at loggerheads when it comes to their own affairs. The detestation of Greeks for Slavs, and of both for Armenians, is undoubtedly more pronounced than that which the Christian subjects feel for their Mohammedan masters. And the animosity is of old standing; it dates from the seventh century. Furthermore we must take into account the jealousy that exists between Bulgarians and Servians, and between these two taken together and the Rutzo-Wlachs; so that, however effete the political and military power of the Sultan may be, his disunited and quarreling Christian subjects will always be an unequal match for his army.

"From the moment the Turks lost Bude, in 1682, began the process of crumbling off in small pieces, which, with momentary interruptions, has continued ever since. This process will go on also during the near future. During the nineteenth century Greece, Roumania, Servia and Bulgaria fell away from the empire. The twentieth century will begin with the breaking off of Macedonia, to be followed by that of the district of Adrianople. But as regards Constantinople, this most coveted and most precious heirloom, it is destined to play the same part in Turkish rule in Europe that it played under the history of the Byzantine Empire, with this difference—that it would be premature to try to foretell at present when this change of masters will come about.

"The death struggle of the Sick Man can be hastened by only one important incident: the steady deterioration of his financial condition, the disease from which he is suffering most. With the increasing poverty of the Turkish nation and with the dire emptiness of the Turkish exchequer, it is impossible to rule over divers and inimical populations, and with Turkey's absolute lack of credit in Europe, it is inconceivable how the present from hand to mouth policy can go on for any great length of time."

Gifts to Hospitals

"Many witticisms fell daily from the lips of our late King," said a Portuguese Consul.

"The King was, you know, a splendid shot. At a dinner the rather inferior shooting of an English visitor was praised and some one said:

"'And Lord Gadabout, you know, sends everything he shoots to the hospitals.'

"The King laughed, and taking the long, black cigar from his lips, he said:

"'Naturally, since he never shoots anything but gamekeepers.'"

An Inspiring Olympic Story

From J. B. Connolly one expects good work and good workmanship as a matter of course, but it will surprise his most ardent admirers to discover how completely he has laid aside the manner with which he treats his Gloucester fishermen, and how admirably he has caught the point of view of the modern Greek. "An Olympic Victor" is scarcely longer than the average short story, and though it is built about the first revival of the Olympic games, the real interest is centered entirely in the Marathon race. Perhaps only the professional athletes and the competitors in the contest could tell today who was the victor in 1894, but Mr. Connolly has chosen to give the honor to a Greek youth, Loues, whose term of service in the army had but just expired. This Loues was the godson of one Euripides, a lame shoemaker who in spite of his poverty and humble station, kept alive all the traditions of his ancient race and all the pride in their past achievements. He had fed the youth on the tales and legends, and kept alive in him the spirit of patriotism. It was the ambition of Euripides to see some Greek the victor in the great contest, by preference his own beloved Loues, but if not him then some other. Mr. Connolly was himself an Olympic victor, and is an athelte of no mean powers, yet he is singular in this respect, that he has not chosen for his victor a professional athlete fed and trained like a prize animal, nor one who has spent the best years of his life in matching his muscles and neglecting his mind, but this simple, clean, wholesome, generous youth whose strength has been developed unconsciously in walking the roads and climbing the hills about his native village. Unlike the professional athlete, whose head is turned and who becomes a useless parasite, eventually ending his days a pensioner on the bounty of his friends, Loues speedily tires of the adulation lavished upon him. The wealthy widow who has published her intentions of marrying the Olympic victor may look elsewhere for a spouse; the banquets and balls, the gifts and glorification are all very well for a few days, but Loues asks but the privilege of returning to usefulness in a humble capacity. As for the fifty thousand francs, "I ran not for gold." Though he probably had no such conscious intention, Mr. Connolly has done more in this simple, straight story to reconcile the ordinary, average citizen to the perpetuation of athletic contests than have all the football nightmares and college tales of the last two decades. It will do no harm to call attention to two other apparently little known books by the same author, boys' stories in which hard work and patient application, not dissipation and idle sport, are the themes. "Job Hutton" and "On Tybee Knoll" should take the place of the conventional story of the preparatory school in which oversmart youngsters play practical jokes on their teachers and mates, and win honors in football and hurdling though their Latin and mathematics are relegated to the background. "An Olympic Victor" ought to prove equally acceptable to readers of seventeen and seventy and every age between. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons.

"The Call of the City"

A delightful volume of miniature essays entitled "The Call of the City" will find its favor among the elect few. Charles Mulford Robinson gently directs attention to the kindly aspects of city life, its beauty, its fellowship, its human interest, its comforts, its historical charm, its opportunities, its entertainment, and its other attractions which of late have been passed over and belittled. The essay itself has fallen into disrepute in these times. It has become the vehicle of prosiness, of labored style and platitudinous word-piling, something to be avoided by the cautious and openly shunned by the intiated. Mr. Mulford has succeeded in bringing back something of Ik Marvel, George William Curtis and others of that ancient school who wrote intimately to the hearts of their readers. Most of these have appeared as contributions to monthly periodicals and the assidious reader of the magazines will recall with pleasure, and if he be a true lover hasten to secure in permanent form these unconventional bits of cheerful optimism that have reminded him that cities are not all slums and the unemployed, joy is not confined to camps and picnic grounds, and that the "pleasure in the pathless woods," the "rapture of the lonely shore," the "society where none intrudes," are heightened by a return to the companionship of mankind and participation in the wholesome activities of commerce and trade. An attractive little volume of comfortable coat pocket size, from the Paul Elder Co.

Politics in the Closet

Some hubbub has been aroused in academic Berkeley where Lincoln and Roosevelt are hitched abreast in the shafts of the political cart, by the remarks of Lieutenant-Governor Porter upon the practical result of performing a political duty as compared with the inutility and futility of attempting to reform conditions for which the reformers themselves are largely responsible. The Lincoln-Roosevelt reformers thought that the Lieutenant-Governor was taking a side wipe at them, and their resentment was expressed in many subsequent caucuses of the "league," which has so completely "reformed" Berkeley that there isn't anything else, politically, in the town. Lieutenant-Governor Porter advised in the spirit of the practical politician; he told the students that mere theory of "reform" is absurd when it comes in contact with an organization of "performers." That was all; yet the wise men of Berkeley took exception to the practical politician's candid exposition of a principle in politics as old as the science of government. Many things are taught at Berkeley; but it is safe to assume that Machiavelli is never mentioned there; that Talleyrand is unknown; that Walpole is only a name in English history; that Jefferson and Clay and Jackson and Taft and Bryan are classed with the heroes of the Greeks; and that Roosevelt himself is observed as through a glass, darkly, in the aspect of a reformer and not in his real guise as a performer. We are sorry for these closet politicians, who are so wise in the lore of books and so ignorant of the ways of men. We are sorry for them because they seem so sincere in their effort to preserve the youth in their care from the contamination of a sordid, practical, selfish world, and because these young men will lose their respect for their teachers almost as soon as they come into the world and are themselves of the world worldly—sordid, practical and selfish; learning to "perform" and realizing the absurdity of taking seriously reformers who are in need of reform.

The Bigotry of Reformers

Even the reformers of this city have taken exception to Lieutenant-Governor Porter's sentiments, and they have done so with a copious outpouring of what the reporters describe as "caustic verbiage." On this side of the bay the language of indignation has yielded for the castigation of the unhappy Porter many of the choicest epithets of contumely and opprobrium. If Horace Greely, who once asserted that nothing so enrages a reformer as to be asked to settle his board bill, or dear old Ralph Emerson, who observed the inclination of some reformers to hypocrisy, have witnessed from the other world the grilling of Porter they must be convulsed with laughter. How deeply rooted in human nature is the persecuting impulse; how strong the indisposition to vouchsafe liberty in the expression of opinion! Opinions of course are evidence of the character of those who hold them; and we have a right to discountenance a man for holding opinions which we know to be inimical to social order, but surely there is nothing dangerously heterdox in the opinion that there are practical politicians who are preferable to wild-eyed reformers. This is one of the opinions to which the politician from Watsonville gave expression for the edification of the students of Berkeley. He was merely deducing principles from his own narrow experience. It is not to be claimed for him that he displayed either the philosophic resources of an original thinker or the large sagacity of a great statesman. As a matter of fact he did nothing more than hash up a large assortment of time-honored platitudes, absolutely harmless and of no consequence. Even the salient sentiment of the harangue, the one that excited the rage of the reformers, if not an insipid truism is at least a commonplace of popular conversation and it has been doing service since the days of the Prophets of Israel. Reformers always have been more or less under suspicion. Comparatively few of the world's great reformers have been even partly disinterested. Most of them were desirous of the reward of goodness, and to get that reward there was no violence too appalling for them. Greater men than Warren Porter have swatted reformers. Reformers have never been popular; nor have they always been right. To assume that a reformer is right merely from the circumstance that he is a reformer is to set up an absurd postulate, for we learn from history that the principles of reform often have been at variance, and that reformers have at times striven to reform one another, the result being a great deal of bloodshed. Reformers have frequently hanged men for trifles and banished them for things not worth mentioning. In advising the students of Berkeley to abjure reformers Lieutenant-Governor Porter doubtless had in mind the representatives of the Lincoln-Roosevelt and Good Government Leagues and Graft Prosecution, who appear to be typical of the worst and most generally despised variety of the species. It is not likely that he would advise the students to be intolerant of all reformers. Surely he is aware of the fact that to reformers we are indebted for the greatest triumphs of civilization. In all probability he assumed that the students of the State University know that we must look to the reformers, as Emerson tells us, for the harmonization of the Real and Ideal. He did nothing more than set his face against selfish schemes of morality and against those reformers from whom the cause of reform suffers more than from machine politicians. Even though it should be felt that his creed has flaws, since there is much evil in machine politics which should be abated, yet we should commend him for disdaining that road to truth in political morals which leads through the commonplaces of cant. To traduce him for his sentiments is to exhibit the characteristic spirit of the benighted bigot of reform who cannot bear discussion, who has neither forbearance nor charity, and whose favorite pastime is loading people with reproaches. "You are suffering," argued Job's friends, "therefore you are guilty." "You are not with us," argues the pin-headed reformer, "therefore you are a crook."

A Dream of the Optimists

Mrs. I. Lowenberg's admirable purpose novel, "The Irresistible Current," is still a subject of discourse and controversy among the cognoscenti and the illuminati; which speaks well for book and author. The central idea, as it was discovered recently by the Optimist section of the California Club, is the necessity of a universal religion which shall promote a love of God and the brotherhood of men. The only difference of opinion upon this postulate expressed by the Optimists was whether this religion should emanate from the heart or the head; but the published reports of the discussion failed to announce the final decision of the majority of those who debated the momentous question. After all it doesn't matter in the slightest whether a "universal religion" shall exercise its influence on the emotions of women and susceptible men, or appeal to their intellects; for such a thing is impractical and ultimately impossible. Religion and the utter absence of religion are strictly and entirely the result of personal feelings. Faith is a natal proclivity, predilection or predisposition; like the aptitude for the arts or a talent for mechanical pursuits. In some it is no larger than a grain of mustard seed; in others it is as big as a mountain. Religion based on faith can be no more "universal" than a genius for music or the ability to drive a nail straight. The highest development of Chinese art is not comparable with the best product of the western masters; yet 400,000,000 human beings prefer Chinese art. A sonata by Beethoven would be discord in the ears of millions whose standard of concord has not been assisted by the method of Beethoven. Even those who are accustomed to the Beethoven harmonies differ in their appreciation of their beauties; and one Wagner rejected them altogether; instituting a new cult in musical taste; whereupon the world of music is at this moment trying to adapt itself to the new dispensation, with but meager success, the heretics far outnumbering the faithful. Nothing can be "universal," and least of all, a religion. It is easy enough to theorize on the possibility of a "religion" that shall recognize one God and include in its basic principle "the brotherhood of man"; but the "one God" would be in the image of its maker, and the "brothers" would still insist upon proving "their doctrine orthodox by apostolic blows and knocks; as if religion were intended for nothing else but to be mended." Let the Optimists of the California Club make what effort they may on behalf of a project to promote universal politics; but also let them give up the idea that they can compel or persuade their neighbors to accept the "universal religion" they have formulated. How would they like to have their neighbors instruct them in the sort of "universal religion" that should be promulgated by the Optimists? Mrs. Lowenberg's novel is a very readable book, and it contains much "food for thought"; but it is only a novel, nevertheless, and can never displace the Vedas or the various versions of the Bible as a compendium of what men should believe, disbelieve, or pretend to believe; what they should worship or how much brotherly love they should bestow on their fellow men.

The Fatal Flaw in a Political Drama

A character actor of many innate gifts, Judge Dunne has attacked the role of a martyr with good intentions, but there commendation must stop. Unconvincing in his mimetic efforts, his failure however is not due altogether to his own shortcomings. The Martyrdom of the One Just Judge is a play without motif, and the atmosphere being more suitable to a farce than to a tragedy, the principal character labors under disadvantages which it is impossible to offset. Conflict is essential to tragedy, and this important element is lacking in the Dunne play. Apparently the forces of evil have all lost interest in Dunne's aspirations. They have done nothing to animate his sedate and jovial campaign. There are no indications of a concerted effort to deprive the great, good natured and indulgent public of his distinguished services. Naturally the apathy of his despised and loathsome enemies is disconcerting and aggravating to his friends, for the latter confidently expected to be supplied with a pretext for shrieking their heads off, and here they are, without an incentive, going through their paces and striving desperately to make it appear that they are thwarting a conspiracy of titanic proportions. In the circumstances their sheet iron thunder is ineffective; their finest ecstasies simulated in vain. With all their strident vocabulary they have failed to set men by the ears. But notwithstanding the failure of Judge Dunne's martyrdom the situation is far from hopeless. A sufficiency of audacious proclamation and ingenious insistence may yet win the imbecile classes, for when a political crime is projected, they are easily made an accessory after the fact. Despite the apathy of the wise who are intolerant of Judge Dunne for reasons unnecessary of enumeration, if the rogues to whom he prays can sufficiently propagate the delusion that he is really a terror to bad men they may succeed in fastening him on the bench for another term. There is only one thing for them to fear, and that is that in their zeal they have unconsciously exposed their paramount interest in Judge Dunne's election. From the signs of the times we infer that the reactionists who are beginning to view newspaper puppets with aversion, and who are realizing that political puppetry is a species of harlotry, are every day becoming more numerous; incidentally, that it is dawning on the public mind that newspaper-owned officials are gradually converting this nation into a government by journalism, which, considering the state of journalism, is not a consummation devoutly to be wished. To many persons of keen perceptive faculties already it has been made obvious that Judge Dunne's claim to public confidence are based principally on the alertness which he has shown in executing the designs of a little band of self-anointed individuals whose motives have come to be misunderstood or unappreciated. Maladroit in their methods these individuals affirm that the pliant but durable judge has vindicated his pre-eminent fitness for the bench by his uniform concurrence in their whims and caprices. Though they exalt him above all other judges they do not insist it is because of the texture of his morals or the fineness and compass of his understanding that he is immeasurably beyond his contemporaries. In their eulogies and rhapsodies they do not impute to him the qualities of an impartial judge. So great is their appreciation of the qualities by which he is endeared to them that inadvertently they make clear their absorbing personal interest in his welfare. This in our opinion is folly, and it may prove disastrous to Judge Dunne. These misguided boosters go so far as to claim him as one of the units of the Graft Prosecution, oblivious of the fact that if this claim be established the final appraisement of him must accord with the ultimate judgment upon the whole conduct of an enterprise inspired by Rudolph Spreckels, blessed by Frémont Older, perfumed by William J. Burns and bungled by Francis J. Heney. Now, we submit, Judge Dunne's friends are not pursuing a wise course. If Judge Dunne should suffer defeat, we shall have no hesitation in charging up his misfortune to the fatuity of the men who, putting too much of the odium of responsibility on their puppet, have in a great measure confirmed the suspicion that he presided over the Schmitz case according to programme and is open to fresh engagements. These men actually seem to be unaware that the Graft Prosecution has lost its hold on the public imagination and that everybody connected with it is believed to be in urgent need of fumigation. Nor apparently are they capable of perceiving that even though the Graft Prosecution were above reproach it would not be to Judge Dunne's credit that he acted in a dual capacity on the bench, combining the offices of judge and prosecutor. Yet from all that is being urged in his behalf the impression is irresistible that his election is being advocated by Mr. Spreckels' lackeys in journalism solely on the strength of the uniformity of his obedience.

The Idol of the Masses

From the campaign bureau presided over by Mr. Roosevelt has emanated a document presenting a comparative exhibit of the number of prosecutions and other proceedings directed against "organized labor" by the Department of Justice under Democratic and under Republican rule. The purpose of this exhibit is to show that the Roosevelt Administration has been more lenient to labor unions than was the Cleveland Administration. In the comparative statistics there is to be found charged against Democratic rule the suit instituted by the order of President Cleveland against Anarchist Debs at the time of the great railroad strike, fourteen years ago. To this same case President Roosevelt made reference in his recent controversy with Mr. Bryan, and for the express purpose of disparaging the Democracy among workingmen. Whether or not he accomplished his purpose, we can be fairly certain that he lowered himself in the esteem of such men as are able to perceive the contemptible character and mischievous effect of the motive which prompted the discrediting of an act that stands out in American history as a signal triumph of devotion to constitutional principles, an act that will serve as a precedent for guidance in possible emergencies of direful portent—an act that stifled anarchy, averted bloodshed and vindicated the genius of American institutions. Perhaps none of the innumerable inept instances of self-revelation which from time to time have enabled us to glimpse the impulses of our idolized ruler stampeded so vast a number of the dwindling army of his worshippers as that in which he suggested that Mr. Cleveland should be execrated by organized labor for quelling a revolution that threatened to engulf the nation. And yet the full depravity of that suggestion, which is now repeated in the campaign document issued by the Department of Justice, was not hitherto apparent. While the meanness of the motive was apprehended, it was hardly conceivable that the President appreciated the importance of Mr. Cleveland's achievement. It was reasonable to suppose that Mr. Roosevelt was insensible of the gravity of the crisis brought on by the strike; and as for the inspiring and inspiriting effect on the public mind of prompt demonstration of the adaptability of the machinery of our government to an unprecedented and appalling exigency, that, presumably, was something which had never occupied Mr. Roosevelt's thoughts. But now comes proof positive that the man who has been appealing to class prejudice by pointing to the Debs case as evidence of Democratic perfidy, apprehended perfectly the whole situation and applauded Mr. Cleveland for the course which that statesman pursued. In February, 1895, only six months after the strike, there appeared in the Forum an article from the pen of Theodore Roosevelt on "True American Ideals," from which we have made the following excerpts:

"Of course the worst foes of America are the foes to that orderly liberty without which our republic must speedily perish. The reckless labor agitator who arouses the mob to riot and bloodshed is in the last analysis the most dangerous of the workingman's enemies. This man is a real peril; and so is his sympathizer, the legislator who to catch votes denounces the judiciary and the military because they put down mobs. We Americans have, on the whole, a right to be optimists; but it is mere folly to blind ourselves to the fact that there are some black clouds on the horizon of our future. During the summer of last year every American capable of thinking must at times have pondered very gravely over certain features of the national character which were brought into unpleasant prominence by the course of events. The demagogue, in all his forms, is as characteristic an evil of a free society as the courtier is of a despotism; and the attitude of many of our public men at the time of the great strike last July was such as to call down on their heads the hearty condemnation of every American who wishes well to his country. It would be difficult to overestimate the damage done by the example and action of a man like Governor Altgeld of Illinois." * * *
"Had it not been for the admirable action of the Federal Government Chicago would have seen a repetition of what occurred during the Paris Commune, while Illinois would have been torn by a fierce social war; and for all the horrible waste of life that this would have entailed Governor Altgeld would have been primarily responsible. It was a most fortunate thing that the action at Washington was so quick and emphatic. Senator Davis of Minnesota set the key of patriotism at the time when men were still puzzled and hesitated. The President (Cleveland) and Attorney-General Olney acted with equal wisdom and courage, and the danger was averted. The completeness of the victory of the Federal authorities, representing the cause of law and order, has perhaps been one reason why it was so soon forgotten; and now most of our well-to-do shortsighted people actually forget that when we were in July on the brink of an almost terrific explosion the Governor of Illinois did his best to work to this country a measure of harm as great as any ever planned by Benedict Arnold, and that we were saved by the resolute action of the Federal judiciary and of the regular army."

Such were the words of the man who is now trying to make political capital out of the contrast between his official attitude of pusilanimity and forbearance toward organized labor and the courageous and conscientious attitude of Grover Cleveland. They are the words of the most vociferous moralist of the day, of whom it is said that though occasionally his conduct may arise from mistaken motives of right there can never be any question of the simplicity and sincerity of his character.

A Plaint of Dry Places

By H. W. B.

Solemn and silent are our solitudes,
  Voiceless and lithe the lizard rustles by;
Death is his penalty, whoe'er intrudes
  Upon this unwalled privacy.

At night the shameless moon, unveiled, undim,
  No sound of water in the wady hears,
Each morn upon the sharp horizon rim
  The disc-divided sun appears.

The hills, dry breasts that ne'er will suckle, lie
  In virgin loneliness, unkissed by rain;
Dry are the valleys, dry the heights, and dry
  The air that quivers o'er the plain.

Rare miners, on the utmost edges, bore
  Our flinty sides, and, far above, the kite
Fast flees on fear-struck pinions, when we roar
  In anger at the dynamite.

Miles may not measure us or leagues attain
  Our boundless boundaries; only from the sky
The stars can scan the length of all our plain,
  The breadth of its intensity.

Mists know we not, nor clinging fog, nor dew,
  That washes out at night the sins of noon,
Sands only hot and brown, sky hot and blue;
  Tearless we weep and crave a boon:

Bless us, O God, with Noah's curse, when he Saw battling clouds subdue th' insistent sun, Throw wide thy sluice gates, Heaven, that thence a sea
  Descending merge the seas in one.

Perspective Impressions

Whatever happens on Tuesday we shall all be glad when it is over.

The Hon. James D. Phelan is stumping the State ostensibly for Bryan. Jimmy is still chasing his Senatorial rainbow.

Now that catering to the mob is considered the most profitable kind of journalism the poor appear to enjoy a monopoly of whatever principle remains.

Headline in a local daily: "Roosevelt Spends His Birthday Working Hard at Desk." Astonishing, it appears, is the condescension of His Imperial Majesty.

Reputable alienists assert that insanity will, ere long, touch the majority of our population with its blight. Then we shall have a government of the crazy, by the crazy and for the crazy, and Bryan will probably have a chance.

"Standard Oil is not the only interest that names judges," says the Bulletin. To be sure it isn't. There's Mr. Spreckels of the Sugar Trust. He'd like to name the whole judiciary for the beneficent purpose of keeping is as clean as a Spreckels.

"The real issue of the campaign," said Mr. Taft at Baltimore, "is whether you think the Republican party by what it has done in the last twelve years is entitled to your confidence." Bill is hedging. A little while back he was willing to stand on the lean years of Teddy's service.

Would it not be well, before going to the polls, to reflect that the newspapers that are making most of the noise in this campaign and that seem to have on hand an inexhaustible supply of personal abuse, are the papers that were similarly clamorous for the election of the Automobile Twins and all the rest of the current dispensation?

Feeding on Wind

An Elaboration of the Roosevelt Method of Utilizing the Apt Allusion Based Upon the Singularly Pertinent Biblical Quotation Employed in a Recent Campaign Document with the Purpose of Confounding a Political Opponent and Confusing a Political Issue

By Democritus

"Ephraim feedeth on wind." So quoted the Lord Roosevelt on Bryan and Gompers, to indicate that these men were chasing unsubstantial things. How forcible are right words! but what doth your arguing reprove? For, lo, he that formeth the mountains to chase bobcats therein, and createth the wind for the purpose of declaring unto man what is his thought; that maketh the morning darkness, and treadeth upon the high places of the earth—what shall we say of him? Ephraim, it is true, did make a covenant with the labor unions of Assyria, and by them is Standard oil carried into Egypt; but how about him who hath ascended into heaven? who hath gathered the winds in his fists? who hath bound the waters in a garment? who hath established all the ends of the earth? what is his name, and what is his son's name, if thou canst tell?

The Lord Roosevelt hath also a controversy with Judah the nature faker, and will punish Jacob Foraker according to his ways. Is it meet that one who walks with the wind saying I will prophesy unto thee of my politics, shall rebuke another for the thing that is not save in the mind of him who uttereth the vain saying? For as the crackling of thorns under a pot, so is the saying of many words about nothing in particular by one who sits in the seats of the mighty; this also is vanity.

Ephraim Bryan and Ephraim Gompers are not, verily, like unto a pair of turtle doves for pulchritude, nor as two young pigeons offered for sacrifice; and it may be that they are speaking smooth things unto the face-sweating multitude of those that toil and spin, and prophesying deceits to those who hold their thorny hands for hire; for what availeth the wrath of the Lord Roosevelt thereat, if he shall write five columns of his wrath to say that which could have been said within the compass of a cub reporter's record of a dog fight? Yea, verily, it is like unto a fig tree which casteth her untimely and unnecessary figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind; for it is written, even in the Book wherein it is also written that Ephraim feedeth on wind, that the Lord passed by, and a great strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks before the Lord; but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire; but the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire a still small voice! And that was the voice of the Lord, making outcry over a matter so small that the thing concerned had to be read between the narrow lines of a party platform to be discerned even by the vivid imagination of the Lord Roosevelt.

But the reign of the Lord Roosevelt cometh to an end in the fullness thereof and Jehu Taft the son of Nimshi Taft shall be anointed king over Israel, as it was spoken in the convention of the G. O. P., and the two Ephraims shall be cast into the outer darkness of Nebraska, yea, into the gehenna of Oklahoma. Thus much do I prophesy unto you; and more. Mine eyes behold the day when the Lord Roosevelt shall print his words in a book month by month throughout all the months of the year even from Sebat to Thebet and from Nisan to Adar. And in that day, Ephraim, which is the son of Bryan, shall say, Behold, mine adversary hath written a book; surely I will take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown of gold to me—when thistles grow instead of wheat and cockle instead of barley. And the common people that toil not more than eight hours nor spin at all if they can help it, preferring to wear fine linen like Solomon in his glory, under a high protective tariff, will read the books which the Lord Roosevelt will write and forget to read the books that shall be written by Ephraim the wine-fed.

And in that day when the Lord Roosevelt shall write his monthly book it will be useless to strive against him, for he giveth not account of any of his matters, but maketh his account with the publishers like the seller which is the best. Moreover I see the Lord Roosevelt Nimroding in the uttermost parts of the earth, in the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the rivers of Ethiopia; and he will stretch out his hand to smite the lions and the bobcats of Egypt with all his wonders which he will do in the midst thereof, to be written thereafter in his monthly book of marvels more miraculous than any related by the nature fakers or the muckrakers; for the Lord Roosevelt is not like unto the tribe of mollycoddles, though there be some who say that he is the President of the Ananias Club by lack of veracity in the writing of adventures with the wild animals he has known. And for all that he shall write in his monthly book he shall receive a wage in shekels exceeding the price paid to Kipling the scribe. For the words of the Lord Roosevelt will be worth more than the words of Ephraim, even in the ratio of sixteen to one.

Wherefore it is my prophesy that whereas Ephraim now feedeth on wind, in that day the Lord Roosevelt shall feed on the increment of wind, not unearned, but gathered as the children of Israel gathereth manna in the wilderness and as Elijah the Tishbite was raven-fed with bread and flesh in the morning and bread and flesh in the evening, while hiding from Ahab the son of Omri by the brook of Cherith, that is before Jordan. In that day which my vision bringeth clear to my understanding the Lord Roosevelt will care not overmuch for the shekels of the Philistine tribe of publishers, but for the joy of standing perpetually in the limelight. Not for the bread and flesh of his ravenous providers will he write the words of his tumultuous thought out of the depths of the spirit of his mind. As praise with the sound of the trumpet; as praise with the psaltery and harp; as praise with the timbrel and stringed instruments and organs, shall it be to the Lord Roosevelt in the day when he shall print his words in his monthly book; yea, even as praise upon the loud cymbals; praise upon the high sounding cymbals.

This is to show that with a Cruden Concordance and a King James version of the Bible anyone can pretend to imitate knowledge thereof. Mr. Roosevelt wrote that quotation from the first verse of the twelfth chapter of Hosea as glibly as if it had been familiar to him from his youth upward. I doubt this intimate acquaintance with Ephraim and their diet of wind. I fail to see the appositeness of the allusion, but I suppose Mr. Roosevelt wanted to make very emphatic his opinion that even if Bryan and Gompers should attempt to legalize their supposititious law for the regulation of injunctions, they would fail because the Supreme Court would declare all such laws unconstitutional. Now, nobody knows what the Supreme Court would do with laws that have not yet been formulated, except by hypothesis in the mind of Mr. Roosevelt. Of course Mr. Roosevelt, in the hurry of his dictation did not follow his opinion to this logical conclusion, but he did follow it as far as the logic applied to Mr. Bryan and Mr. Gompers, which brought the complete letter writer to the word "sham." His active mind at once sought for a synonym for the word "sham," which he uses immediately after his quotation. A sham is an illusion, an illusion is something intangible, elusive, unsatisfying; and what is more intangible, unstable and uncertain than the wind. There you have the key word of Mr. Roosevelt's thought in this section of his discourse —wind. A moment, Mr. Secretary; let us see what the good Book has to say about wind; the Concordance, if you please; ah, now we have it—where was I? ah, yes; "but there is another account against Messrs. Bryan and Gompers in the matter"; insert right there, "Ephraim feedeth on wind," never mind the chapter and verse or the quotation marks; we haven't time for the one, and perhaps the reader will think I invented the phrase.

By deduction I arrive at this analysis of the Roosevelt process of thought and if I had time I could analyze the rest of the Roosevelt mental output in the same thorough and satisfying manner; but I am growing old, Molly darling. I would suggest, however, as an excellent exercise in Biblical research, that those who have read Roosevelt and now read me, trace my allusions in the foregoing travesty to their original source in the Scriptures via Cruden's Concordance.

The Master

By Pierre Audibert

When the symptoms of appendicitis had declared themselves for the third time, Dr. Quercy, the celebrated surgeon, decided to perform the operation upon his wife himself. To assist him and administer the chloroform, he called in his favorite pupil and friend, Paul Grondel.

She lay there, stretched out on the long nickel table, a white cloth drawn over her, exquisite under the strong light that came from above. She was sleeping, very quiet and very pale, on those sheets that might yet be wound like a shroud about her fair body, which seemed to shrink from the cold, cruel searching of the steel knives. Without a tremor the surgeon examined his instruments, each in its place, dumb servants awaiting the call of the master.

Grondel had his finger on the patient's pulse, but his eyes were turned to the place where, invisible, death was knocking at the door of life. He closed his eyes and turned deathly pale.

Suddenly, from that still face which looked as if it were carved in Carrara marble, there came a voice, as if from afar.

"Paul, I am not suffering . . . . it seems to me that I am wandering about immense blue plains . . . I hear bells ringing . . . I am so happy . . . Yet how can I be happy without you? . . . . Why are you not here with me? . . . . This is the happiness you promised me . . . . that we both yearned for . . . . You know . . . . how I love you. . . . . I knew nothing of love until I met you. He, he was so cold, so serious . . . . frozen, you called it. I did not know that I had any feeling . . . . I was just like a good little girl. Now I hate him, I hate him . . . and I belong to you, you know . . . only to you. I did not want to be in the same room with him . . . . I told him so . . . . He did not seem to mind. I don't know that it made him suffer. . . . . I would have been . . so . . happy."

The words were lost in a sob. Grondel saw a hand upon the smooth, white skin, moving swiftly; there was a gleam of steel and then a long red line. The surgeon had made the first incision. His face was an intellectual mask, cold, impenetrable, intent only upon the work at hand.

Without looking up, he said quietly: "Is the pulse normal, Paul?"

"Yes, master," Grondel answered firmly.

The surgeon continued his work with the mechanical precision of a machine. The forceps clicked as he laid them down on the metal table. He rolled plugs of antiseptic cotton slowly, methodically.

Grondel's eyes followed the nervous rise and fall of the breast, and not another drop of the anesthetic fell upon that death-like mask from which now issued only inarticulate sounds. He was thinking only of his ruined happiness, of his professional career which had now probably come to an end, of this fair body now spotted with blood, which but a few days before he had held in his arms, breathing, glowing with life.

Would not this man, whom he saw before him moving slowly, methodically, push the lance but the fraction of an inch beyond the danger line, angered thereto beyond the endurance of man? Was he not the master of both destinies, was not death his servant, quickly obedient to his mandate? What would Grondel do, alone in life, without her? Oh, God!

The muscles of the patient contracted and the surgeon remarked very calmly: "Give some more chloroform, Grondel."

Then the drops fell like rain, and little by little the heaving of the breast subsided. The operation was finished. Quercy brought together the edges of the wound, and from right to left the needle went in and out along the red seam.

Now there came a sound as of some one strangling. Grondel continued pouring the poison and the sound became sharper.

"Careful," the surgeon said, "her tongue is affected."

But Grondel, gray-white, continued pouring the liquid, the lurid light of madness in his eyes. He gripped the frail wrist of the woman as if he would crush it.

The surgeon drew the sheet back over the body of his wife. Then he came toward Grondel, and firmly, but always quietly, he unclasped the student's hand and put aside the poison. Then, with a bitter, cynical smile upon his lips, he took the forceps and seizing the patient's tongue began the slow, rhythmic movement to restore the action of the lungs.

Grondel had fallen into a scare and his tightly compressed lips showed his struggle to control himself.

There was silence in the room for a few moments and then the master turned, and looking his pupil fill in the face, said:

"Courage, Grondel; I will give her back to you."

Abruzzi as a Matrimonial Catch

By Wallace Sievers

Considered from the viewpoint of genealogy the alliance of Miss Elkins and the Duke of Abruzzi is the best purchase of a title ever made by an American heiress. Princes and counts are quite common in sunny Italy; so common in fact that a traveler can hardly enter an ordinary hotel without meeting a half score of them. They are the prolific product of a generous system of title descent. But in Italy as in all other countries governed by the Almanac de Gotha there are dukes and dukes and of these Abruzzi is of the best, for he is a nephew of the king. According to the register Prince Luigi Amedeo Giuseppe Maria Ferdinando Francesco, Duke of Abruzzi and captain in the Italian navy, is a lineal descendant of the House of Savoy, now reigning in Italy, a grandson of King Victor Emanuel II and a nephew of the present king, Emanuel III. He has two brothers, Emanuel, Duke of Aosta and Victor, Count of Turin, so he is of sound royal extraction, as far as the reigning House of Savoy goes. He is the son of Amadens, Duke of Aosta, who died in 1890 and the Princess Marie del Pozzodella Cisterna. Unlike most dukes Abruzzi has sought exercise for his robust powers in a life of endeavor. His chief success has been in the field of geographical exploration where he has attained a world-wide reputation. He ascended Mt. St. Elias in 1896 and four years later succeeded in penetrating nearer to the North Pole than had ever been done before, beating Nansen's previous record. Two years ago he led an expedition to Mt. Ruwenzori. He has just published his own account of the wonders of that unusual trip. On account of his high birth, his interest in affairs outside of society and his daring in leading adventurous exploring expeditions he is regarded by the public as the most romantic figure among the members of the ducal houses of Europe. Miss Elkins and Abruzzi met abroad last year. Later the Duke came to America incognito and took occasion to spend the most of his time among the resorts of southern Florida, where Miss Elkins, accompanied by her mother, was then sojourning. It was not till last January that the intimate social friends of the family awoke to the fact that the Duke was a serious claimant for the hand of Miss Elkins and thereafter the pursuit was watched with lively interest. This interest was intensified and broadened immeasurably when the secret leaked into the public prints and the daily press began to publish surmises on the probable course of events. For reasons of their own the Abruzzi and the family refrained from squarely admitting the engagement. Even as late as this week the formal announcement had not been made, although it was well known that the bride's trousseau had been selected and the bridesmaids chosen.

American brides have married dukes of high standing before, as did Consuelo Vanderbilt, Helen Zimmerman and May Goelet, but they are not the descendants of a reigning house. Even the title of princess does not always gain entrance into a royal family or convey international distinction as witness the marriage of Julia Grant with Prince Catacuzene of Russia, and of Clara Huntington with Prince Hatzfeldt. Glorious Betsy Paterson married her prince and, could she have had her way doubtless would have made a man of him, but Napoleon the very eccentric Man of Destiny decided otherwise, and destroyed an alliance that would have ranked for decades as the most illustrious match made by an American girl with the wearer of a foreign title. Since that unhappy event the very highest title that has come courting to this country is that worn by Abruzzi.

Very nearly two hundred American heiresses have married into the European aristocracy during recent years, and a big percentage of them have been divorced. It is estimated that barely ten per cent of the British peerage have chosen their brides on this side of the water. These dozen or more American born peeresses have succeeded generally in creating so favorable an impression upon English society as to convey the idea that they are far more numerous than is really the case. Of these the three Duchesses, the wearer of the coveted clover leaf, have attracted by long odds the largest share of public attention. They are the Duchess of Marlborough, Miss Consuelo Vanderbilt; the Duchess of Roxburghe, Miss May Ogden Goelet, and Helen Zimmerman, the Duchess of Manchester.

Others there are who have cut prominent figures not only in society but in the politics of the British realm, notably Jennie Chamberlain of New York, who married the late Lord Randolph Churchill. Daisy Leiter of Chicago as the wife of the Earl of Suffolk was a figure of consequence during the period that her husband was viceroy of India. Mary Endicott of Boston was one of the ruling matrons in London salons in the heydey of the career of her husband, Joseph Chamberlain. Julia Grant as the Princess Catacuzene of Russia, Gladys Vanderbilt as the Countess Ladislas Szechenyi, Alice Thaw as the Countess of Yarmouth were quietly lost in the foreign society they joined. It requires either superior brains or extraordinary wealth for the American girl to maintain any prominence in the land of her marriage adoption. Jennie Chamberlain dominated her sphere through her wit and tact. In contrast the present pale, golden haired Countess of Craven, daughter of the very wealthy Bradley Martins, supports her position in the most lavish manner and is courted extensively in consequence.

The California heiresses and others who have contracted marriages with titles have scarcely created a ripple on foreign shores, though several have allied themselves with princes. Time has kindly curtained the seamy side of the romances in the lives of several of them. The match of Eva Bryant Mackay with Don Ferdinand Colonna, Prince Castigliano, was once considered a brilliant one and so it was as far as the gilding of a title with great wealth was concerned; so was the unfortunate alliance of Clara Huntington and Prince Francis Hatzfeldt. Among the other California women who mated with titles are Louise Bonynge, who married Major General Sir John Maxwell; Virginia Daniel Bonynge, who became the wife of Viscount Deerhurst, Fanny Fithian of Santa Barbara, who married Count Arthur de Gabriac, Amy Green, who graced the home of Sir James Howe, Margaret Hamilton, who became Lady Sidney Waterlow, Elizabeth Sperry of Stockton, who married Prince Andre Poniatowski, and Florence Sharon, who became the bride of Sir Thomas Fernor Hesketh. Not the least happy of the number in her conquest of a title was little Margaret Mooney, the vaudeville actress, who won the boyish heart of Lord Sholto Douglas.

Those students of society who have watched the venturesome sailing abroad of the matrimonial crafts of American heiresses and foreign titles all agree that the conditions are quite different in the several countries. When one considers the mental and temperamental contrasts of the Latin, the Teutonic, the Slav and the Anglo-Saxon races this judgment is not surprising. The home life is naturally different. Mary King Waddington, who spent many years in the intimate study of home life abroad, commented not long ago on Italian marriage life as follows: "Italian marriages are quite different from those in France and England. Italians are just as easy-going with their wives as with anything else in their lives. They don't in the least wish them to be very intelligent, or very cultivated, or to take a great interest in their career. As a rule they haven't any career except politics and diplomacy (the army is not considered at all the brilliant career it is in other countries—the pay is small and promotion slow.) As long as the wife is amiable, nice to her husband's family and friends, makes his home pleasant and doesn't expect too much of him in the way of attention, or great intellectual effort, he is satisfied. I can imagine nothing so unlike an Italian as an Englishman or an American. What makes the Italian's great attraction, the absolute lack of self consciousness, the vivacity, exuberance of speech and gesture, quick changes of feeling most forcibly expressed, great artistic sensibility of sound and color and a fond and extraordinary insonciance (not absolute indifference) to what goes on around him, is such a perfect contrast to the practical, self-controlled, self-contained Anglo-Saxon, that one wonders how such perfectly different elements ever merge into anything harmonious—but they do."

The Spectator

Not Social Rivalry This Time

Our perennial social leader, Mr. Edward Greenway, has returned to town from a business trip up the Coast, and though he is soon to pull off his annual birthday dinner and dance his big heart is troubled and his massive brain is agitated by misgivings. It is not his crown that is the cause of his current uneasiness. That crown has been threatened scores of times without affecting Mr. Greenway's composure in the slightest degree. A social butterfly seemingly never so well satisfied with himself as when flitting from debutante to debutante with dainty compliments on his lips, yet he is above all things a man of business, and commercial competition quickens his emotions far more than social rivalry. Ned has a far better memory for the number of cases of champagne of each brand consumed at the last midsummer jinks of the Bohemian Club than for the pedigree of the belle of his last ball. Don't imagine for a minute that Mr. Greenway permits himself to become absorbed by the petty trifles of the social whirl. All of which observations are by way of breaking the news that Ned is up against the wine fight of his life. And at this time of life with a rebellious liver threatening to go on a strike Mr. Greenway has reason to be discomposed. Almost as soon as he got off the train he learned that the Clicquot people had made a new deal, and that Willie O'Connor had been engaged to carry the war right into the heart of Burlingame. Now Mr. O'Connor is not only equipped with a young liver and the open sesame to the inner circles heretofore dominated by Mr. Greenway, but he is also popular wherever good fellows get together. O'Connor has joined forces with Frank Thompson, the Family Club's crack vocalist, and between the two of them with a wine that isn't a test of friendship, a pretty, if not heartbreaking pace, will be set for the gallant dictator of the thirsty 400.

Gebhardt Selling Wine

Speaking of wine agents I am reminded that in a recent letter from New York I was informed that Freddy Gebhardt is now stimulating the flow of champagne for hire. Along the great white way and wherever life is fast, furious and frolicsome he is booming his employer's brand. As this means of course a great reversal of fortune for the millionaire who was once famous for his racing stable and notorious for his relations with the Jersey Lily, it is somewhat surprising that the Sunday Supp. writers have not exploited the story with the usual pictorial concomitant illustrative of the lights and shadows of a career of exceptional color and interest. But Gebhardt has been out of the limelight so many years that perhaps he has been forgotten. It was when Lily Langtry made her first tour of America in the early eighties that Freddy Gebhardt came into prominence. He was then known as the best dressed man in America. He accompanied Mrs. Langtry to this city, where she lived for a time intent upon establishing a residence for the purpose, it was said, of obtaining a divorce and marrying the rich New Yorker. The ranch which she bought at that time in Lake County was said to have been presented to her by Gebhardt. Some years after their separation Gebhardt married a Baltimore belle from whom he was divorced four or five years ago, later marrying one of the innumerable original Florodora Sextette. Mrs. Langtry, by the way, who has been having ups and downs all her life, was reported last week to have won another fortune on the turf.

Nurse—"Willie, the stork has brought a little baby sister. Would you like to see her?"
Willie—"Nope; I've seen babies. Show me the stork."

The "Latest Shortage"

Expert accountants have figured out that the latest shortage in the City Treasury amounts to $60,000. Though this is called the "latest shortage," it is far from certain that the appellation is accurate. As experience of municipal affairs teaches that it is usual, whenever anybody helps himself to public money, for a considerable length of time to elapse before the theft is discovered, we should not feel sure that since Treasurer Bantel retired to private life there has been no felonious abstraction of loose change from the capacious sieve into which the coin of the taxpayers is deposited. The chronology of the history of municipal defalcations must ever be in a state of confusion. This is very much to be deplored, for we can never know with any degree of accuracy how far it is safe for us to go in indulging the official taste for luxuries. For all that we know the money that is being consumed by the automobile habit and the private detective fad will be needed later on for sewers and street lights. It is earnestly to be hoped that the officials who take our money surreptitiously are not depleting the public funds as rapidly as Mayor Taylor and District Attorney Langdon, but you can never tell. It was demonstrated in Mayor Phelan's time that "hefting" is not an infallible method of finding out how much money there is on hand, but notwithstanding the Widber defalcation apparently no servant of the people has deemed it worth while to devise a system for ascertaining beyond doubt at any time the total amount of money in the treasury. We are still doing business in the old haphazard fashion conducive to the temptation of our servants, and we can only speculate blindly as to whether we are cutting according to our cloth. Who knows but at this very moment we are bankrupt? Not Mayor Taylor, I'll wager.

Yerkes the Wine Mocker

I have not the infelicity of an acquaintance with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I have heard that his name is Yerkes and that he is a citizen of the State of Kentucky. Commissioner Yerkes, however, is no stranger to the wine growers of California, and his recent attempt to throttle one of their subsidiary industries by forbidding the use of American sweet wines in patent medicines, does not commend him to their most ardent affection. It is said that the Commissioner's ruling was inspired by the distillers of whiskey whose product would be used exclusively to fortify the proprietary cure-all if a prohibitory edict could be made to operate against domestic wines, the price of which to the consumer is less than that which the distillers would charge for their hotter stuff. The circumstance that Commissioner Yerkes is a citizen of Kentucky lends color to the suspicion that he is "standing in" with the whiskey interest. A sort of demurrer has been entered on his behalf in the statement that his official prohibition does not extend to imported wines; but as no thrifty manufacturer of a patent medicine would dope his panacea with port of Alto Duoro or sherry of Spain or any of the high-tariff vintages of the Rhine and the Moselle, his ruling must be accepted as evidence of his high-proof affiliation, and his consequent inimical attitude towards the American wine grower.

A Giant and a Pygmy

If the whiskey interest is behind Commissioner Yerkes in this effort to deprive the viticulturists of America of a share of the bibulous trade, it is rather small business on their part. The total wine product of the United States does not exceed 40,000,000 gallons, while the total production of distilled spirits is in excess of 150,000,000 gallons. Surely there ought to be sufficient profit from the whiskey trade on this enormous product, without seeking to filch a measly $3,000,000 to $5,000,000 from the wine trade. A thimble-full of red liquor sells over the bar for ten cents; a bottle of California is included in the price of a fifty-cent dinner. Wine may be a mocker (when it masquerades under a foreign label), but strong drink is raging. If the suspicions of the wine-makers are accurate, perhaps the whiskey men are striving to back fire the prohibition movement that has swept so fiercely over so many states; perhaps they are so hard hit that they are compelled to count every nickel of profit and loss, fearing that the next move will be reactionary in the direction of true temperance in the use of fermented liquor. It is certainly plain that universal prohibition cannot prevail perpetually in a country as cosmopolitan as is the United States. The present attitude of the communities where prohibition has been voted or enacted is due chiefly to the belief that much of the crime and misery of the people is the result of unrestrained and intemperate use of alcoholic beverages in the form of whiskey and the stronger distillations. There is reason to believe that if the prohibition could be confined to these liquors, wine and malt liquors would be permitted in every State in the Union. There is a flavor of mediaeval fanaticism in the present prohibition movement that must eventually work its own palliation. In the meantime it is unfair, unjust and absolutely uneconomic to cripple an industry that contributes so largely to the general wealth of the nation, and at the same permitting the import of foreign wines aggregating upwards of $12,000,000 in value per annum. I hope that by the time these remarks appear in print President Roosevelt will have called Commissioner Yerkes down with a dull, sickening thud, as requested by the California Grape Growers' Association.

"I hear that O'Brien is going to win his campaign with flying colors."

"Sure. He's never stopped waving the 'long green' since he was nominated."

History in the Making

During the past half century memorable dates have been of almost daily occurrence in the history of Japan. The most recent of these events was the audience granted by the Japanese Emperor to Admiral Charles S. Sperry and the officers of the American battle fleet on October 21, 1908. This audience to Admiral Sperry may be regarded, historically, as a sequel to the audience forced by Commodore Matthew Calbraith Perry from the Shogun of Japan on March 31, 1854—an interval of exactly fifty-four years, six months and twenty-one days. Also note the similarity of the names of the Commodore and the Admiral. When Commodore Perry's fleet anchored off Uraga, a port at the entrance of Yedo Bay, in July, 1853, and delivered to the representatives of the Shogunate the letter from President Fillmore demanding the establishment of international relations between Japan and the United States, the dark-featured, heavy jawed, slow-spoken potentate who gave such cordial welcome to Admiral Sperry last week, was an eight-months' infant, mewling and puking in his nurse's arms, thick-swaddled in royal silk, himself and his family prisoners to the feudal lords, in the imperial palace of Kioto. Admiral Sperry's host was eight months older when Comodore Perry returned for an answer to that letter; he wore a long kimona of Hachioji silk, and was eating two-crop rice of Tosa fed to him with silver chopsticks fashioned from ore of the mines of Innai by the best enamel and repousse art of Nagoya. What Admiral Sperry was doing at that time is not definitely recorded, but it is possible that he was engaged in the same absorbing occupation after the manner of the democratic American infant. Anyway these two men met after all these years, and, apparently, they were very glad to be acquainted. No doubt the admiral's imperial friend will speedily confer upon him the usual decoration—that of the Order of the Rising Sun, now proudly prized as a unique curio by every consul and vice-consul whom the accident of politics or the exigencies of any diplomatic service has grafted upon the grateful remembrance of the Japanese Foreign Office.

A Hollow "Ovation"

For myself, I am not wholly assured of the sincerity of this Japanese "reception," royal or popular. I read in my favorite newspapers that by order of the Japanese authorities the populace of Tokio turned out en masse in a "grand torchlight procession" to manifest the peace and good will of the Japanese nation towards the American nation. It is written by the historians on the spot that this mob, numbering thousands, gathered in the Daimyo Quarter, a section of Kojimachi containing the residences of the foreign diplomats, to banzai the American ambassador. Mr. O'Brien didn't happen to be at home, but Mrs. O'Brien and the ladies of her court responded to the ovation and remained in view of the enthusiastic assembly until their maids announced that it was time to dress for dinner. All of which impressed Admiral Sperry (as it will impress the unthinking American publicist) with the idea that all these hands are firmly clasped across the sea; that nothing can now sever the friendly relations existing between Japan and America. I am of another opinion. The Japanese are a volatile, show-loving, noisy, lip-serving, banzai-shouting, paper-lantern-bearing, utterly untrustworthy folk. They are as likely to throw bricks at the American legation as they are to throw compliments. Let them hear that we have refused to admit their peasant laborers to this country as freely as we admit the "scum of Europe," and the action of that Tokio mob would be quite different, I am convinced. In that contingency those "hands across the sea" would be converted into fists along shore, and the samurai police with their spectacles and their notebooks would have to be called out to quell the disturbance; the gens d'armes, with their German caps and their clanking swords would be ordered to guard the approaches to Kojimachi. It must never be forgotten that the Japanese are a "proud and sensitive" people, and that it requires as little to arouse them to anger as it does to please them with a rare show. I wouldn't trust the smile of a Japanese farther than I could see it through an ordinary field glass, and that is farther than I could toss one of their iron gods with one hand tied behind my back.

Taft the Father of a Hero

It is related in the record of current history that Robert Alphonso Taft, son of the Republican presidential candidate, junior student at Yale, put out a fire in Vanderbilt Hall by pouring a pitcher full of water upon it, thereby reducing the flames to a smother of smoke easily disposed of by the chemical engine that soon arrived in response to the alarm that had been sounded. Accompanying young Taft in this perilous enterprise was Henry Payne Bingham, the Yale quarterback; but as Bingham's father is not a candidate for the presidency, or any office, in fact, he plays only second fiddle in this heroic adventure. The limelight is all on the son of the Republican standard bearer, and the classmates of the young man whose glory before he became a hero was reflected from that of his distinguished parent, are demanding that a Carnegie medal shall be conferred upon him. I hope that young Taft will live up to the traditions of his family, which include a long record of modest performance of duty and generous self-sacrifice. I hope that when that medal is presented to the son of the prospective President of the United States and former Governor of the Philippines, he will pass it over to his companion in peril, the sturdy quarterback of Yale. Then will a nation of eighty million hero worshippers lift their united voices in one glad acclaim; and, if the act of self abnegation can be accomplished before next Tuesday and properly heralded in the newspapers it may serve to swing all the "doubtful States" into line for the hero's father; and it is not beyond all impossibility that even the solid South may contribute some of its more chivalrous States to the Taft column. Unfortunately for Mr. Bryan that candidate has no son to play hero on his behalf. He has a daughter who might be used as a heroine, but if the Peerless Leader should attempt to play that game it is a two-to-one shot that his friend Roosevelt who has daughters to spare would retort in kind with more spectacular effect. Perhaps Bryan had better fight it out to the bitter end with his saddest words of tongue and pen.

The Villifying of Cook

The solicitude for Judge Dunne that is being exhibited by Mr. Spreckels's employes and admirers is equaled only by their hostility to Judge Cook. In discussing Judge Cook they wanton in virulence and calumny. For them no slander is too debasing, no invective too intemperate, no imputation too foul. Is Judge Cook really so depraved and licentious as Judge Dunne's passionate boosters would have us believe? If so, how shall we account for the support which the man whom they are so frenetically villifying is receiving from many upright citizens? The fact was disclosed at a recent public meeting that among the men whose esteem and confidence Judge Cook enjoys are the Hon. Daniel Ryan and the Hon. Hiram Johnson, to whom special reference is made for the reason that they are beloved by the Spreckels organs which would have us belive that none but the corrupt commend the man whose defeat they are eager to compass.

A Clergyman's Objection

One of the very mildest of Dunne boosters is the Rev. C. N. Lathrop, of the Good Government League, whose assault on Cook, he tells us, is based on a decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Pons vs. Wittman. In that decision, says the reverend purveyor of personal abuse, the Court grilled Cook for granting an injunction. "I do not want to make any personal references to any candidate," says the distinguished clergyman, "but that report speaks for itself"; and then despite his professed repugnance to personal reference he adds: "To re-elect Cook would be a dishonor." I am glad to know the specific ground of Lathrop's objection to Cook. I am glad to know that his objection is a conscientious one; that it springs from honest conviction. Incidentally I am glad to know that he has faith in our Supreme Court; that the opinion of the judges of that high tribunal is by him deemed worthy of respect. All this I am glad to know because I have been laboring under the delusion that no man who considered it an honor to be identified with Judge Dunne's cause regarded our Supreme Court as anything but an abomination. If all of Judge Dunne's boosters are of one mind with the irreproachable Mr. Lathrop then I have misapprehended the issues of this campaign, and should meekly confess my fatal fatness of mentality. Judge Dunne as I supposed is being urged for re-election mainly on the strength of his brutal assaults on all appellate judges who have not agreed with him. To approve of Judge Dunne, I have assumed, is to express impatience with the tribunals above him, and to testify acquiescence in his unsupported aspersions on the judges who have overruled him. It is absolutely beyond my mental powers to construe the honoring of Judge Dunne as anything but the dishonoring of the judges who rendered a decision which he attributed to corrupt motives.

What His Honor Said

So that nobody will be vexed with doubts as to what a vote for Judge Dunne means, I will quote from the court records. On March 14, 1908, Judge Dunne said in open court, referring to Abe Ruef: "The defendant would be sentenced to the maximum term provided by law if the Supreme Court had not come to his relief." The mean innuendo is surely apparent enough. Abe Ruef pleaded guilty before Judge Dunne May 20, 1907, and he appeared for sentence every two weeks until March 14, 1908, when Judge Dunne used the foregoing insulting language. I am not now inquiring why in all that long period Judge Dunne failed to sentence Ruef. I believe everybody knows there was a promise of immunity, though Judge Dunne swears there was none and swears that two rabbis are liars. I only desire that those who believe it an honor to vote for Judge Dunne shall be reminded of his efforts to slander the highest courts of the State. To that end I quote again, this time from a statement signed by Dunne for publication: "I am satisfied the opinion was written to protect Ruef instead of Schmitz and to keep him from testifying against the friends and relatives of the judges of that court. . . . I think the decision was hurried by my action in sending Ruef to jail. The fear was that he would there weaken and tell all he knew. . . . Such a method of decision seems childish, and any court that indulges in such special pleadings must be animated by motives of malice or interest. . . . I believe that if I had had the power to appoint an elisor for that court and had been able to protect it from outside influence it would have rendered a decision more in conformity with the law and the evidence."

He Will Investigate

Far be it from me to assume that the Rev. C. N. Lathrop would accept the Supreme Court as a witness against Judge Cook and refuse to accept it as a witness against Judge Dunne. I prefer to believe that he abhors disingenuity and is quite as fair as he is logical. Assuming therefore that he is sincere in objecting to Judge Cook on the ground that he was once grilled by the Supreme Court for misinterpreting the law I must also assume that on reading his Town Talk this week he will withdraw from Judge Dunne's club of boosters. For here is some information that will surely alienate Mr. Lathrop's honest affections: whereas Judge Cook has been scored once or twice for misinterpreting the law, the scoring of Judge Dunne has been a continuous performance. Being a lover of truth the Rev. Lathrop unquestionably will start out tomorrow to seek either corroboration or rebuttal of this my gratuitous testimony. To facilitate his quest I will direct him to Chief Justice Beatty, a gentleman much honored in this and neighboring States. Justice Beatty has had much experience of Judge Dunne and of Judge Dunne's peculiar relations with the law. I believe he has had other experience from which he was able to judge of Judge Dunne's moral character. Whether he will care to discuss Judge Dunne is a question I cannot answer, but when a man is in search of the truth he should go to the best available source. Justice Beatty is a good citizen as well as a good judge, and I am inclined to the opinion that he will not refuse to answer questions which he is able to answer with accuracy touching the disqualifications of a candidate for office.

Where Are Heney's Convicts?

Will it be deemed impertinent if I inquire how many criminals are now wearing stripes at the behest of Francis J. Heney? I am not minutely familiar with the Arizona and Oregon records of this famous professional prosecutor; and if some one better informed than I am will kindly send me a tabulated statement I shall be much beholden. Would it be asking too much of Mr. Heney himself? Have you ever sent anybody to a real, permanent, impregnable, non-appellative penitentiary, Mr. Heney? There now, we've had enough of what you intend to do; it isn't your good intentions that I require for this hell pavement, but your actual performance that I would file for record with the heavenly chancellor. We know from day to day what you have failed to do; now tell us what you have really done. I ask these questions in justice to Mr. Heney. He has been rebuked, admonished, advised, reproached and even abused for his failure to convict anybody in California of anything. Now let us give the famous prosecutor a chance; let us balance the entire account; let us know all about the folk he has sent to the penitentiary—who, how, when, where? If necessary let us offer a reward for the discovery of a Heney conviction that stuck. If Mr. Heney will produce incontrovertible proof of a convict of his making who can't get out, it will go far towards palliating his failure to convict anybody in California.

Advice to the Immunity Bunch

A number of the talesmen summoned in the Ruef case escaped jury duty by announcing that they would not believe Mr. Heney's immunity witnesses under oath. I wonder why? These witnesses have confessed that they received bribes from the agents of public service corporations. Is that the reason why their testimony is worthless in the opinion of potential jurymen? It is also notorious that they have been bribed by the graft prosecution with immunity from the penalty of their confessions. Is that another reason why they are discredited by jurymen? Is it because, in the estimation of decent citizens, an informer is the most despicable of creatures? Is it because the entire graft prosecution is gangrened with the taint of the Burns method of convicting those accused? Perhaps the reason is dependent upon all of these possibilities. Perhaps these talesmen think that a confessed criminal's testimony is as suspicious as that of a convict who suffered the penalty of his crime because he refused to "squeal on his pal." Perhaps the discarded jurymen were moved to their bias by contemplation of the utter cowardice of a "confession" under duress, extorted in the shadow of prison walls and within call of the turnkey. Perhaps these honest, upright, law-abiding citizens argued that a coward, an informer, a near-prison bird, is also, and of consequence, on occasion, a liar. Certainly a man that would accept immunity from a prosecutor seeking to reach his enemy would not hesitate to lie at the behest of the prosecutor. That is part of the infamous bargain. A refusal to commit any perjury that might be required of him would set the prison gates ajar for him and be the cue for the turnkey whose duty it would be to stalk behind him. Is it any wonder that such men are regarded as pariahs and probable perjurers? And what will become of them after they have served the only purpose for which they are fitted? Where will they hide their shame? I suggest that they drown themselves; that is an easier way out of it than hanging.

Sullivan's Latest Ebullition

That impulsive gentleman, the Hon. Frank J. Sullivan, who recently assured us from a public platform that he is cultured and educated to the brim, hired a hall the other night for the purpose of declaiming against Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 31, which is designed to enable banking, trading or benevolent corporations to extend the life of their corporate franchise. This amendment was drawn at the request of several commercial and savings banks, the corporate charter of which will soon expire, and it has been endorsed by nearly all the commercial organizations of the city, including the Mutual Savings Bank, of which Mr. Sullivan is a director. Mr. Sullivan's objection to the proposed amendment is that among the institutions which will be able to avail themselves of its provisions is the Hibernia Bank, of which he is not a director, and he has made it quite clear that he does not approve of the Tobins, who, in all probability, are not among his admirers. Mr. Sullivan is a very sensitive individual, easily inflamed, and somewhat misanthropic, for despite the wealth he inherited his ambitions have been thwarted so often as to render him sensible of the fact that notwithstanding his many graces of person he is unappreciated. Years ago he ran for Congress and was defeated, and he contested the election of his successful opponent and was again defeated, though, according to report current at the time, he assured the members of Congress that for pulchritude he had the other fellow lashed to the mast, or words to that effect. Recently he was a candidate for election before the Democratic State Convention, and met his usual fate, his soul again being filled with anguish. Still more recently he publicly affirmed his superior culture, and embarrassed Judge Coffey, we were told, by telling that gentleman to his teeth in the presence of a large audience that he was the only honest man on the bench. At the present time he is achieving fame as an obstructionist being a plaintiff in a suit the effect of which will be to prolong the life of the shattered City Hall. Mr. Sullivan is a lawyer of infinite leisure, a circumstance that may be significant of his opposition to an amendment designated to obviate the necessity of going to law to extend the life of a corporate charter. However, the ways and designs of Mr. Sullivan are as inscrutable as those of Providence.

The Great Specialist Was There

The Hon. Frank J. Sullivan is not the only distinguished citizen who hopes to embarrass the Hibernia Bank by campaigning against a proposed Constitutional Amendment. Associated with him in the campaign, eager to lend him moral support, is Dr. Gibbon, a medical practitioner who advertises that he is "the most successful specialist," and "continues to cure all"; also that "persons at a distance may be cured at home" of debility and other things. He even guarantees his cures. This eminent specialist sat on the platform the other night while the cultured Sullivan did the talking. Dr. Gibbons agrees with Mr. Sullivan that as he has a grievance against the managers of the Hibernia Bank the Constitutional Amendment should be beaten.

Greenbaum's Judgment Vindicated

Will Greenbaum was one of the proudest men in town this week. And not without justification. He had staked his reputation as a connoisseur of music on his judgment of the vocal ability of Blanche Arral, the Belgian singer, who made her first appearance here last Sunday afternoon at the Van Ness Theatre, and she made good. There were scoffers about town, who, hearing that Greenbaum had pronounced Blanche Arral a coloratura singer of the first rank, with a voice of top-notch quality and absolute proficiency in all the intricacies of the art, suggested that generous allowance should be made for the impressario's habitual enthusiasm and self interest. Many of these scoffers attended the concert in a spirit of defiance. They challenged the singer from the moment of her entrance, and she compelled their homage. Unquestionably she is a great artist, with a voice of rare sweetness and the ability to use it effectively. Her numbers were chosen with a view to the display of the wide range of her art and at no point did she fail of achievement.

Great Quartz Discovery

Frank Berry of Berry Bros., the largest individual operators in Alaska, who recently returned from that territory, says that paying quartz has been discovered in so many places in the interior that it is certain to become one of the great permanent mining regions of the world. Rich quartz veins have been discovered in the Innoko. Before leaving Fairbanks he met John Bonnifield, the pioneer of that section of Alaska, in the range of mountains which bears his name, and Bonnifield told him of a ledge which he had traced for two thousand feet on the surface. He found it from eight to twelve feet in width.

Big Boom Predicted

"All I have seen," says Berry, "astonishes me and confirms the idea that a placer country always leaves something behind it besides bedrock on the surface. I was therefore not surprised when I reached Dawson to find that a new quartz district had been found near Five Fingers in the Yukon territory. I examined the ground and found ore that carries big values in copper and gold and enough of it to make every man rich who is on the right ground. Taking it all in all I believe that interior Alaska is on the verge of a boom that will end in seeing that territory produce more gold than all the rest of the United States combined, and that the day is not far distant."

Bound in Marriage "For Fun"

The recent decision of a Los Angeles judge to the effect that a marriage entered into "for fun" is binding is one which will commend itself to the thoughtful. Two years ago the lady in the case went through the ceremony in full legal form on the strength of a dare. Now, having found some one more to her liking, she is anxious to have the first marriage set aside in order that she may contract a second, and no doubt, in due time, a third and fourth on her showing that she would like another change of partnership. There have been quite too many of these so-called jokes perpetrated and judges in general have been too often inclined to regard them as humorous. A girl who is temperamentally inclined to enter into a marriage "for fun" is not apt to make a satisfactory wife. Neither is a man who will accept a wife on a dare apt to possess many of the qualities which make for successful husbandhood, so that, being a pair of fools, they are well mated, and as long as they are held fast bound to each other they are restrained from spoiling the happiness of two others who, conceivably, might otherwise become their respective spouses. When people marry in good faith and make diligent effort to live in concord there is seldom need to consider judicial separation. When they have done their best and yet find that they cannot live in reasonable harmony it is a misfortune for which divorce is the desperate remedy to be resorted to only in such extremity as would, in case of accident, justify an amputation. But when men and women at an age at which the law recognizes their right to marry, and, presumably, not being feeble minded, they have at least a rudimentary knowledge of the meaning of the contract, have no more common sense than to make a mock of it, they have proved themselves unfit for marriage. They have had their chance and misused it and they should be held in such restraint as to prevent a repetition.

He—"I hope you'll think of me when I'm far away."

Planning a Big Balloon Race

The disaster to the big air ship in Berkeley checked for a time the rampant fever for aereonautics in California but signs are plentiful that it is breaking out again and more vigorously than ever. The California Aero Club and a number of enthusiastic air sailors in Los Angeles, among them Dick Ferris, are at present planning a big aerial race from that city to the Atlantic seaboard, or as far eastward as they may sail. It is expected that at least a dozen amateur balloonists will join in the contest. Already some very notable balloons have been entered in the race. The "United States," in which Lieutenant Lahm won the James Gordon Bennett Cup, is now owned by Ferris and he proposes to attempt to win the prize in that famous vessel. Mrs. Ferris says she will accompany her husband on the voyage. The "American," which finished second in the great St. Louis race and which is still owned in that city, has also been entered for the contest. J. S. To Stimulate Aeronautics in California

The contestants are banking on the great trade wind which sweeps easterly from Los Angeles to carry them well into the interior of the continent, says Mr. Zerbe. Weather bureau officials and balloon experts have closely studied the air currents of the region and have guaranteed an ideal sailing course and a steady air current till the contestants are over the Rockies. Only one point holds any threatening weather and that is a region of storms with Santa Fe as the center, but the eight hundred miles to that point cannot be beaten for ideal balloon weather, and once that point is safely passed comes another stretch of excellent sailing space. Correspondence is now going on to interest well known eastern balloonists in the race. Through this venture the originators hope to stimulate interest in aeronautics among wealthy local amateurs and build up an interest in the sport that will place California on the plane of the influential Aero clubs in New York and the big European citiies.

A Letter from Drew

John Drew has written to a friend in this city that next season will be the last for some time that he will be seen in the modern society drama with which his name and personality have been identified ever since his Augustin Daly days. He will act in one other modern piece and then abandon society drama. His intention is to revive two or three of the old comedies such as "She Stoops to Conquer" and "The School for Scandal," and then he will be seen as Benedick in "Much Ado About Nothing." In December Mr. Drew will leave New York and play straight across the country to this city, in "Jack Straw," the comedy in which he has been delighting New York audiences for several months.

Didn't Know His Wife's Name

Nat Goodwin is back in New York and from that city comes the news that he has been joshed unmercifully by his friends of the Lamb's Club for being ignorant of the name of his most recent wife. In his complaint for divorce filed in Reno the little comedian misstated his wife's name, a circumstance it is said, due to the fact that Maxine Elliott has strewn the pathway of her interesting life with a tangle of names so complicated that even a husband might be pardoned for not remembering them all, especially if he had been married before and had other names to remember. But Goodwin insists that he knows his most recent wife's name. Moreover he declares emphatically that there never was a time since he married his most recent wife that he didn't know her name. Nevertheless in his complaint Mr. Goodwin alluded to his wife as Bessie Hall Goodwin. The judge on examining the papers scratched out the Hall, inserted Dermott and substituted Jessie for Bessie. With these few exceptions he decided that Mr. Goodwin knows the lady's name. The judge had correct information on the subject as he had before him Mrs. Goodwin's power of attorney.

The Star Spellbinder

From reports received at the headquarters of the Republican State Central Committee the strongest drawing card of the present campaign is Mr. Samuel M. Shortridge. If the enthusiasm and size of the throngs that have attended his meetings in all sections of the interior may be taken as an index to political sentiment up and down the State, then Taft will carry California by a tremendous majority. But political meetings are not to be

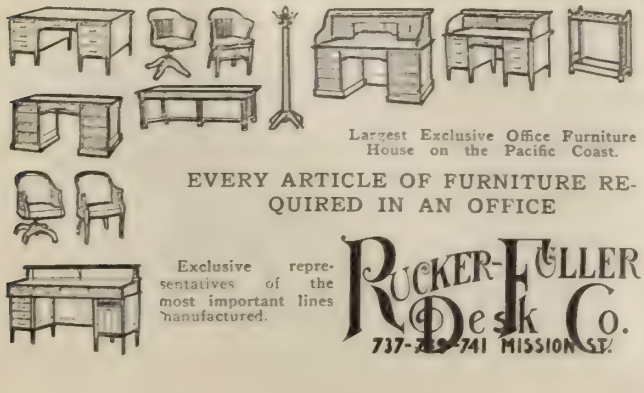
Property Divided the Family



The tea tabbies are actively discussing just now what effect the sudden demise of Henry Butters will have upon the fortunes of Mrs. Butters and the two adopted daughters now living in the Piedmont mansion. Long before the separation the capitalist transferred to Mrs. Butters the titles of several pieces of property roughly valued at a quarter of a million dollars. Mr. Butters expressly stipulated at the time that if his interests were ever pinched by stress of fortune he should have the temporary use of this Oakland property to strengthen his financial position. Apparently safe as Mr. Butters' wide holdings were, at the time of stress following the big fire in 1906 he was forced to ask his wife to let him use property to protect his other holdings till the financial tide turned. Mrs. Butters declined to make the transfer and this is said to be the reason he left the Piedmont home of his wife and took up his residence thereafter with his mother in Berkeley.

Chances of a Contest

It is generally understood that the mining and railroad magnate left an estate worth at least two million dollars, all of which is bequeathed to his son, a lad of sixteen years, now at school in the East. The tea tabbies are a unit in declaring that Mrs. Butters and her two daughters who in early life were regularly adopted by Mr. Butters, will never consent to rest quiet under the provisions of such a will. In a business way Mr. Butters has at times assisted the three children of Mrs. Butters by her two former marriages, but opinion is strong that these children will not join their mother and the two adopted sisters in any action they may take to obtain a redivision of the estate. The family bereavement naturally will have its effect in extending the date of the wedding of Miss Butters and Victor Metcalf, Jr., son of the Secretary of the Navy.

Yosemite in Rich Autumn Garb

Just now the Yosemite Valley is in the height of its glorious autumnal coloring and many visitors are taking advantage of the new and easy approach by way of the Yosemite Valley Railroad to enjoy the beautiful region at this very attractive season. The falls have a large volume of water; the high peaks around the valley are crowned with snow and the trails are still open for travel. The Sentinel Hotel in the valley will be open for guests all winter. The hotel at El Portal, open all the year, is one of the best resorts in the State in which to spend a few weeks for recreation and rest. Those who desire to see the grandeur of the autumn scenes of Yosemite should avail themselves of the prevailing beautiful weather, and take the trip now. Stages leave El Portal at 7:30 a. m., arriving at the Sentinel Hotel at 11 o'clock; stages leave the hotel for El Portal at 2 o'clock, arriving at 5 o'clock. If one is pressed for time he can make the round trip from El Portal, and have three hours to spend in the valley.

A Popular Elector

One of the foremost figures in the business and political life of San Francisco is Harry P. Flannery, the Democratic and State Labor Union nominee for Presidential elector. The bestowal of the high honor of this nomination on him was in recognition of his worth and the esteem in which he is held by his fellow citizens.

Harry P. Flannery was born, reared and educated in the State of Pennsylvania. While still a very young man, some thirty years ago, he came to this coast to seek a fortune and make a home. He had no powerful or influential friends to help him. He had to depend on his talents, energy and force of character. That he is now on the crest of Fortune's wave is not due to luck, but solely to his possession of the qualities essential to successful achievement. After some years spent in Nevada he came to San Francisco and engaged in business. He prospered as many others prosper in this favored land, and when the great earthquake and fire of 1906 overwhelmed and dismayed the city he was among the most hard-hit sufferers. But he was not discouraged. The ashes were hardly cold before he was up and doing. Long before others had made up their minds what they wanted to do, he had the the debris cleared from the most prominent corner in the stricken city and the material on the ground for a new building. A monument to his energy and confidence in the future of San Francisco is the Flannery Building, at the junction of Market, Kearny and Geary streets—the first Class A building to be erected after the disaster.

Although an ardent Democrat, taking a lively and active interest in the welfare of his party, Mr. Flannery is not a politician in the usual implication of the term. He has no axe to grind, and has no designs on any office of profit. Political activity with him is a duty and pleasure and not for financial advancement.

Taken all around he is a perfect type of the shrewd, successful, hustling American; a genial, dignified citizen, possessing in a high degree the quality of personal magnetism. Many a vote will be given to the Bryan and Kern ticket solely as a compliment to Harry P. Flannery.

Among the noted stars booked for appearance at the Van Ness Theatre during the present season are Rose Stahl, Louis James, Lillian Russell, Ethel Barrymore, E. H. Sothern, John Drew, Billie Burke, Richard Carle, Marie Doro and Margaret Anglin.

THE WEEK'S FINANCIAL OUTLOOK

By R. E. Mulcahy

There have been no signs of Bryan's election so far as the security markets of the country are concerned. Union Pacific has again reached a new high water mark. Southern Pacific, Atchison, as well as all of the granger list, have shown improvement. Northern Pacific and Great Northern have been well supported of late; the buying appears to be for foreign account. Holland has always been largely interested in the Hill stocks. It is more than likely the German interests are re-buying these stocks again. The United States Steel quarterly report, just issued, makes a much better showing than was expected; this reflects a better condition in other lines of trade. There has been a very large demand by foreigners for wheat and corn during the past two weeks; this means a flood of money in our direction during the winter months. From the general outlook the holiday season will be passed without a money stringency. The bond market will reflect this condition very shortly. The much looked for decline in values has not as yet materialized, and gives no sign of being realized. It is true securities have had a good advance when measured from the low prices during the panic, but are not high compared with prices prevailing in 1906 and the early part of 1907. Union Pacific will within one year look cheap at 200. The physical condition of all of the large properties has so greatly improved that their operating expenses must soon show these benefits. We are less than a week from election, when the result will determine the future of this country for the coming four years; those who put their faith in Taft's election will surely get the money. If you believe Taft will be elected then buy stocks and bonds; if on the other hand the result points to Bryan, then sell stocks.

Prize Winners at the Conservatoire

The annual competitions for prizes at the Conservatoire in Paris are held now in the Opera Comique, as the classes long ago became so large as to outgrow the small quarters of the school itself. Twenty men sang on the first day, and of these only twelve were accounted good enough to receive notice. The best voice in the lot was possessed by a Russian from the Caucasus, who had so deplorable an accent that it was decided to let him wait for a year before awarding him any prize. Thirty-three women—every one with black hair, which fact may or may not have its eloquence—competed, and only one of these, a certain Mlle. Raveau, awakened any enthusiasm. She shared the prize with a dramatic soprano.

Among the composers the Prix de Rome went to Andre Gailhard, son of the impresario, who has already several compositions to his credit. It was necessary for him to win the Prix de Rome before having a work produced at the Grand Opera, so he has now gone to Rome to compose one. Nana Boulanger, who took the second prize, is a niece of Frederic Lemaitre. She has already won three prizes and is expected to win the Prix de Rome next year.

The Rothschilds Way

Of the great banking house of Rothschilds a New Orleans man said the other day: "The Rothschilds push their strictness to the point of eccentricity. They once had for agent here in New Orleans a fine fellow. They telegraphed to this agent at a certain season to sell their cotton holdings, but he knew the price would go higher and therefore he didn't sell till four days later. In consequence he netted an extra profit of $40,000 to his firm.

"When he sent the Rothschilds the money and told them joyously what he had done they returned the whole amount, with a cold note that said:

"'The $40,000 you made by disobeying our instructions is not ours, but yours. Take it. Mr. Blank, your successor, sails for New Orleans today.'"

Denies the Rumor of Divorce

The friends of Virginia Fair Vanderbilt were not altogether surprised when Rumor got into its touring machine and flew across the continent with the report that there was to be another divorce in the Vanderbilt family. We are tucked away on the western rim of the world, but somehow the news scurries out here in fair season. A friend who occasionally receives a letter from "Birdie" was honored with a missive the other day in which indignant denial of the rumor is written in her own fashionable chirography. So evidently the rent in the family linen, for it would seem that there really was one, has been so carefully darned, backstitched, felled down and pressed, that only the most expert tailor of such material could discover the weak spot.

How the Rumor Reached Here

There were several preliminary hints that reached us, before the story came out in New York. A month ago a fashionable San Francisco matron returned from abroad and regaled the tea hour with a story of meeting Mrs.

MRS. PHOEBE HEARST

One of the leading patronesses at the recently successful big vaudeville tea given by the local Chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy.

Willie in Europe. A discussion of one thing or another brought forth the interrogation, "But doesn't your husband object, Mrs. Vanderbilt?" "I'd like to see him object," grimly responded Mrs. Birdie, with a tightening of the lips which her friends know bodes no pleasantry. So many straws showed which way the wind was blowing that the matron brought home a whole bale of them to scatter among the old friends of the Fair girls.

End of a Thunder Storm

It is pleasant to hear that the latest and official bulletin reads like a pact of peace. The Vanderbilts, until their estrangement, when the wife went to Europe and he remained in this country, were supposed to be as happily married as happiness jog trots in Newport. Just what sent a flurry of storm clouds across their peaceful sky is not given with any authority, but it was evidently a tidy little thunder shower that pretty thoroughly soaked Mrs. W. K. and made her consider the court as a refuge from any further drenchings. Now that the family barometer shows clear weather there is no need for the prying ones to try to account for the affair.

Weighing the Question of Divorce

Burlingame is spreading a thin pat of gossip on its tea biscuits. No one asks for a second helping because it is so hard to gulp the first down between astonishing gasps. But it would really appear that the very beautiful and lovable wife of a jolly young chap who generally behaves like a bachelor is considering the pros and cons of freedom. She is a member of the more conservative set and no one ever fancied that she would seriously contemplate a separation. What the foundation is of this latest fragmentary bit of gossip from Burlingame nobody will tell.

Are Cruising the Mediterranean

My London correspondent writes me that "Dick" Tobin and his sisters, Mrs. Clarke and Mrs. Raoul Duval are cruising in the Mediterranean as the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Guest. Mr. Guest is son of Lord Lonsdale; Mrs. Guest was formerly Miss Amy Phipps of Pittsburg. The Guests have chartered Lord Lonsdale's luxurious steam yacht and are making the cruise mainly because they are temporarily without a country home. Burley-on-the-Hill, Rutlandshire, was destroyed by fire last summer and a new house is being prepared for them while they are enjoying the present cruise. Mr. Tobin and Mrs. Clarke were guests at Burley on the night of the fire. Mr. Tobin figured gallantly as an amateur fireman and rescued valuable paintings and costly relics from the blazing house.

Following the Latest from Paris

The other day Miss Constance de Young and Mrs. Jimmy Coleman made the rounds of the fashionable shops, and wherever they chanced traffic was suspended while the shoppers, thrilled by the very latest from Paris, took eager note of Miss de Young's gown. One rather well bred looking girl, who would not have been suspected of such ill manners, almost walked up the train of Miss de Young's skirt in an effort to see just how the folds were accomplished. Another followed her to the very step of the automobile sketching her hat with surreptitious dots and dashes of a pencil against a pad only half concealed against a purse.

Stimulating the Dressmakers

I have never seen such alert interest displayed in a costume in San Francisco. Not infrequently some eccentricity will claim fleeting attention, but it is not often that women so far forget their dignity as to stampede after a really well dressed woman. Constance de Young is hardly as pretty as her sister Helen, and her clothes while always attractive have never been considered as chic as a yearly trip to Paris would imply. But in view of her approaching marriage the best dressmakers have evidently been stimulated to noteworthy effort. The gown which created such a sensation was a gray cloth made in the modified Directoire mode, the skirt very trailing and commencing about six inches above the waist. The hat was as indefinite as the dress. It will be interesting to see whether her wardrobe contains a number of such stunning costumes.

The Coming de Young Weddings

Very elaborate preparations are being made for the wedding of Miss Constance de Young and Joseph Oliver Tobin on November 18th in St. Mary's Cathedral. Artists have been at work for some time to make as effective as possible the beautiful color scheme of pink and white. Gowns and decorations are being specially designed with this aim in view. Miss Helen de Young will attend her sister as maid of honor and there will be three bridesmaids. A great crush is expected. Just three weeks later the wedding of Miss Helen de Young and George Cameron will take place in the de Young home in California street. Mr. Tobin and his bride will have returned to town by that time and the bride will in her turn act as her sister's matron of honor. A big reception and sumptuous wedding supper will follow each wedding. Splendid arrangements are being made for those events.

Mrs. Martin Objects to Gossips

Gossip is no longer considered good form in smart society, I hear. "Now she's gone, let's talk about her," the modernized version of Goethe's remark so often quoted, is frowned upon these days by the dames who make the laws in San Francisco's smart set. Not long ago some guests of Mrs. Eleanor Martin's were discussing the artistic makeup of a visitor who had just left, when Mrs. Martin chided them: "I wish no criticism or gossip of any kind in my drawing room," said the dowager queen. The women were chagrined. "Her attitude is easily understood," said one later on. "By discouraging criticism she hopes to protect herself."

Their Engagement Announced

A delightful burst of heartfelt congratulations greeted the announcement of the engagement of Miss Grace Hammond to Welbore Stewart Burnett at the tea given by Mrs. Hammond last Tuesday afternoon in her beautiful home in Broadway. The engagement was hardly a surprise to the intimate friends of the young couple, but the announcement afforded them the opportunity to offer their good wishes and shower happy congratulations. Miss Grace is the third daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Hammond and is a charming, clever and unusually attractive girl. She has traveled extensively and has cultivated with success a fine musical talent. Mr. Burnett is of Irish descent and has made his home in San Francisco for several years. He is a lawyer and stands well in his profession. The date of the wedding has not yet been discussed.

A Manuscript Romance

The news that Mrs. Sidney Josephs will soon return home is gratifying to her family and friends. But Mrs. Joseph and her husband wish to see a little more of the European capitals, I hear, before they settle down in San Francisco. This vivacious young woman's particular set, which includes both the smart people and the clever ones of ultra-Bohemia, has always looked to her for original lines in entertaining, just as Mrs. Marcus Koshland's friends expect her to originate entertainments for them. Mrs. Joseph, who was Miss Emily Rosenstirn, is the only daughter of Dr. Julius Rosenstirn.

At the Afternoon Tea in the Laurel Court of the Fairmont Hotel.
Sketched from life

Her two brothers always shared in their clever sister's reputation for originality and unconventionality. There was another sister, a brilliant student, who died in her early teens. Mrs. Joseph was her father's chum ever since she could toddle, and nobody ever thought she would marry, for she often said she had never met a man who could compare with her father. But she collaborated on a novel—some say it was a play—with young Joseph, and it was then that Cupid got in his innings, when the two hearts were occupied over the manuscript.

The Viewpoint of Some Buds

Commercialism is always more lamentable in the very young, and no one can listen to the chatter of the debutantes without wistfully harking back to the days when the taint of sordid reckoning had not blighted to the last bud.

"Did she get many flowers?" I heard one girl ask another.

"Oh, only twenty orchids and about a hundred bunches of flowers. And they weren't very stunning either," sniffed the debutante. "Why, I got fifty-two orchids and mother says my flowers must have amounted to about $1,000. Her's never cost a cent over $300.

"Well, she couldn't expect as much," answered the other girl, "they really have nothing you know, and if it were not for her relatives she couldn't make any showing at all!"

Took His Heart as a Hostage

On dit a charming young woman who left for the East with her mother this week will upon her return, announce her engagement to a prominent society man. The dear old chap looked so disconsolate when she bade him farewell at the mole that everybody present sympathized with him in his approaching loneliness. His intense devotion has been remarked for some time past but his sad appearance on her departure proved him "a manacled hostage in the hands of Cupid," as one of those present on the boat phrased the situation.

The Coming Salon

The fine automobile in which the Prentis Cobb Hales took their wedding trip cost $10,000, I am told, and was a gift from the happy bridegroom to his bride. He is building her a $20,000 house in this city, and when it is finished Mrs. Hale will give a grand housewarming. It is in this house, I hear, that she will try to establish a salon.

Art Exhibit at Del Monte

Early in 1907 the management of the Del Monte Hotel established an art gallery in the hotel as an exhibition and salesroom for the paintings and and photographs of well-known artists. The rooms are in charge of a curator and conducted as a high class art gallery. The hanging committee meets each month when the rearrangement of the pictures, the hanging of new ones and the completion of the catalogue is discussed. Among the members of the present hanging committee are: G. F. Piazzoni, Julie Heynemann, Frank Mathieu, Clara Lundborg, Will Sparks, Dr. Arnold Genthe and James King Steele. The next meeting of the committee will take place at Del Monte on October 31st. It is expected that this winer's exhibition will not only be one of the largest but one of the best ever shown.

Successful Musical Tea

Miss Sara Tomlinson gave a tea and musicale at the Hotel Fairmont on Saturday in honor of Miss Sadie E. Alexander of Oakland, whose wedding to Mr. Harry Tomlinson will be a November event. Miss Tomlinson entertained with a rare musical program, the participants being Miss Ella Atkinson, Mrs. Arthur Bridge, Mrs. Samuel Beckett and Miss Marion Cumming. During the afternoon the rooms were crowded with delighted guests.

Back From Europe

The Garrett McEnerneys having abated the wanderlust by a trip to Europe returned home last week. They started on the trip three months ago, and spent most of their time in Germany, but Paris and other cities of interest were not neglected. Mr. McEnerney was very much in need of a rest, having failed to take the slightest respite from work during the period between the April catastrophe and the day of his departure last June. He went away a tired man, and has returned refreshed and invigorated, as is evident from his appearance.

Berkeley Social Gossip

At the Hotel Carlton in Berkeley much interest is being evinced just now in the training table for the Berkeley football team that has been established there for the three weeks preceding the big game. The private dining room of the hotel has been given over for the purpose and it is an interesting sight to see the sixteen stalwart young giants as they file in to dinner each night and to hear them sing their college songs. * * * The birthday of J. J. Mason last Saturday was the occasion of a very delightful dinner party in the main dining room of the Carlton, at which Mr. and Mrs. Mason had as their guests their several children and grandchildren. Installation of the "400" Lodge

Society in Burlingame and San Mateo turned out last Saturday evening to witness the installation of Burlingame Lodge of Masons. The event took place at the Peninsula Hotel, which Manager Charles Miller turned over to the members of the order and their friends in a manner which warmed the cockles of their hearts. More than three hundred persons witnessed the installation of the new lodge, while one hundred and fifty sat at the banquet table afterwards and enjoyed the generous feast. While the majority of the assemblage were society folk of the two peninsular cities, several delightful parties motored down from San Francisco, remaining at the hotel until Monday morning. A few weeks ago, when the Masons of Burlingame applied to the Grand Master of the State for a charter, and expressly stipulated that their lodge number should be "400," it was realized that they intended to preserve in every way the aristocratic significance of those figures. Manager Miller of the Peninsula was consulted in regard to details and promptly offered the great hallway of the hotel in which to hold the services of installation. The scene was a beautiful one. The hallway, with its open court and grand stairway, was banked with flowers and palms, in the midst of which shone the symbols of Masonry in vari-colored electric lights. Above, on the balconies, stood scores of the fair sex, lending additional attractiveness to the picture. After dinner, which was enjoyed to the accompaniment of delightful music by the Knickerbocker Quartette and an excellent orchestra, several addresses were made by prominent Masons in attendance. Among those who sat at table were: William Crocker, Charles L. Patton, George M. Perine, Robert Bonner, E. F. Treadwell, Charles Jellinek, Clarence F. Bovee, Carleton E. Durrell, Edgar B. Batchelder, Charles T. Foster, Allan R. Hascom, William J. Kidd, Fred D. Lorton, Walter L. Scott, Henry Maier, John M. Chrisman, Thomas H. Gray, Ansel M. Easton, August Berg and Louis A. Murch.

Blue's Latest Role

Rumor hints at the engagement of Dr. Rupert Blue with a very charming girl whose sister is a bride of a few months. Rumor is very partial to hints of this kind, especially when a distinguished officer of the army is concerned. Some months ago when Dr. Blue was too busy to indulge his sentimental emotions he was the object of a good deal of hostility, but riper judgment accords him unstinted praise for his professional and official achievements. And now that he has about finished his labors he can give no better proof of his interest in San Francisco than by winning the hand of a charming young native daughter.

The parlors of Mrs. A. H. Voorhies handsome residence in California street were crowded last Wednesday afternoon to listen to an interesting address delivered by Captain Richard P. Hobson. Admission was by card only, as the ladies present were all enthusiastic over the organization of the California Auxiliary of the Southern Educational Society. Mrs. Martha Gielow, who will give the reading before the same society Friday evening at the St. Francis Hotel, was among those in attendance.

Colonel and Mrs. W. H. Hecht are among the many well-known people who have engaged permanent quarters at the St. Francis.

Back From His Studies Abroad

Mr. Hother Wismer, the well-known violinist, has returned from his year's sojourn in Europe, where he spent most of his time in the studios of the great masters of the violin, Sauret, Cesar Thomson, Professor Marchot and Ysaie. He is most enthusiastic over his association with them. While abroad Mr. Wismer met many well-known Californians: In Paris Mrs. L. S. Sherman and Miss Elsie Sherman, the Wellington Greggs and others. In London he met Mrs. W. H. Sherman and her two daughters and spent a pleasant evening at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Blumenberg, formerly Mrs. Albert Albeg, where he was the guest of honor at a large party. Mr. Wismer will resume his violin class at his residence about November 1st.

The cause is a most worthy one. Among the lady patronesses who are actively working to make this affair a success are Mrs. John T. Merrill, Mrs. Timothy R. Phelps, Mrs. Phoebe Hearst, Mrs. E. R. Taylor, Mrs. Frederick Funston, Mrs. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, Mrs. James S. Gillett, Mrs. Aylett R. Cotton, Miss Laura McKinstry, Mrs. Florence Porter Pflngst, Mrs. Marcus Koshland, Mrs. G. K. Odd Things in the World

Clever Police Dogs

Very little was accomplished in Germany and Austria by the association for furthering the breeding and employment of police dogs till the members began to distribute dogs among policemen and watchmen. These animals got so accustomed to their masters and the rural conditions of their districts that the slightest change from the normal state provoked their suspicion while on their daily patrol, and any amount of cases are published every week where such well trained dogs led their masters to places of outrages which up to that moment were still unknown. Suicides were found in time to bring such poor creatures back to life, murders were discovered while the corpses were still warm, and so of course was the scent. The criminals were at once hunted and stopped not many miles off, waiting for a chance to escape. Tramps hiding themselves in thickets could not enjoy a quiet hour, and many a "wanted" was discovered by the help of these dogs. It is an infrequent occurrence that an outrage is not discovered within twenty-four hours after the commission of the crime. The next "station dog" is at once called, and unless he has not already stopped a suspicious individual during one of his patrols he will pick up at once the line of the criminal after having—in case of fatal outrage—been brought to the corpse. The criminal statistics of Brunswick show that during the last two years not a single murder was committed there or within twenty miles around this municipality.

After a Sunken Treasure

From a shipbuilding yard at Hivenhoe, Essex, a strange looking craft has just been launched which is to be used in a fresh endeavor to recover treasure from the wrecked vessel La Lutine, which has lain for more than a century at the bottom of the sea off the coast of Holland. The craft contains a large tube, wide enough for a man to walk erect in. This it is proposed to sink through the sand which covers the vessel to a considerable depth and so facilitate the work of the divers. In 1799 La Lutine, a French frigate captured by the English, was chartered by a number of London merchants and despatched from Yarmouth with a large cargo of gold for Holland. The vessel was wrecked off the Island of Terschelling, carrying her treasure to Davy Jones's locker. Many attempts have been made to rescue the gold. In 1800 $275,000 was recovered, and later efforts in the '50s resulted in the rescue of $250,000 more. How much more still remains in La Lutine's hold it is impossible to say exactly. The late Sir Henry Hozier, secretary of Lloyd's, estimated its value at over $5,000,000. There were 330 bars of gold shipped, he said. Eighty-five were recovered and 245 still remain to be found. Out of 179 bars of silver seventy-nine are still unaccounted for, and there was also $635,000 in specie for pay of the English troops in Holland operating against the French invaders.

Curious Silent Women

Among the curiosities of religious belief mentioned at the Congress of the History of Religions, which met at Oxford recently, perhaps the most striking was related in the section over which Prof. Jastrow of Philadelphia presided. Here Dr. Frazer told of the Silent Widows of Northwest America and Central Australia, where, partly with the object of eluding and partly with the object of disgusting their dead husbands, it was the custom of widows to keep silence and in various ways make themselves hideous for periods of mourning which, in some cases, lasted two years. There is one particular tribe of Australia aborigines which extends this veto to the mothers, sisters, daughters, and mothers-in-law, so it often happens. A majority of the women in a tribe are prohibited from speaking. Dr. Frazer added that an odd circumstance was that many of them, when the time for mourning was over, preferred to continue to be silent women and to discourse only by signs.

"His Excellency, the Governor"

Given a good all round stock company and it is one of the delights of the season for patrons to watch them exhibit the suppleness and pliability and artistic finish of the organization from week to week in the various kinds of productions they essay. In baseball parlance this is called team work. Nothing marks the superior excellence of a company so much as this good team work, and the man who sweats and labors for its attainment, and who is freely and emphatically condemned if he fails, is the stage manager. In presenting "His Excellency the Governor," this week, the Valencia stock company ventured into a field that would have proved disastrous to any company not assured of its own poise, elasticity and strength. The play is one of those light, fantastical themes, which to preserve the idea and ideal of the author must be played with careful delicacy, judgment and refinement. In the hands of a rough-and-ready lot of actors the production would have become an incomprehensible burlesque and the perplexed audience would have unreservedly pronounced it rot. That the Valencia company succeeded in scoring a hit in a play of this character demonstrates anew their ability as a pliable and finished organization; it adds another feather in the cap of the efficient stage manager. Aside from the clever acting the play affords a slight relief to the heavier dramas of the past several weeks. Nearly all the members of the company essayed parts in striking contrast with the ordinary run of roles. Robert Warwick assumed a chesty, dignified character in which he was called upon to look his best and handle the comedy like a juggler keeping a dozen sensitive eggs dancing in the air, for at any slip on his part the comic dignity of the situation would have gone to smash. Miss Willette Kershaw demonstrated that she is a comedienne of distinction. She has an exquisitely fine sense of humor, a delicacy of touch and a dainty manner than rarely finds a chance to express itself except in whimsical roles. As Stella she had an opportunity to show talents no one suspected her of possessing. Ethel Barrymore created the part and scored success in it. As for Miss Kershaw it is enough to say that she was the bright volatile, vivacious spirit of the production.

Return of the Dutch Comedians

Merely to preserve the outlines of theatrical history it is here recorded that Kolb and Dill returned to town this week and at the Princess Theatre renewed their acquaintance with their admirers of the days before the fire. The length of their sojourn is something impossible of prediction. That it will be a protracted one it is absolutely safe to assert. For the Dutch comedians have lost none of their old charm. If anything they have enlarged their resources since the good old days when theatrical history was in the making in O'Farrell street. They have acquired new airs without any diminution of their old methods of convulsing a helpless and receptive audience. Little Mike is as humble as ever, and experience has not educated him out of any of those congenital susceptibilities which render him an agreeable companion. The Lanky One is as earnest and patient as ever, not a whit less sympathetic nor any more scrupulous than formerly. "Playing the Ponies" is the title of the show in which Kolb and Dill are at present weberfielding, and the title is eloquent enough of the potentialities of the theme. The show has all the old familiar snap and ginger. Musically it is light and airy and so are the girls—the kind to whom the Johnnies are always hospitable. From what occurred on the occasion of the introductory performance it was evident that the comedians have retained a very tight hold on the affections of theatregoers. It was more like a large private reception than a public theatrical performance.

Blanche Arral's Second Concert Sunday

Blanche Arral, the Belgian nightingale, who made one of the greatest successes ever achieved by an artist in this city, will give her second grand concert with orchestral accompaniment at the Van Ness Theatre this Sunday afternoon, November 1st, offering an entire change of program. Of course the audience will not be satisfied without the wonderful "Waltz of the Birds" and Manager Greebaum promises that if the orchestration arrives in time we shall hear Mme. Arral's interpretation of the "Shadow Dance" from Dinorah. The program as thus far arranged includes the great aria, "Ah Fors e

Arral created the role of Laura in Paris under the personal direction of Millocker. There will be half a dozen other splendid compositions, some of which will be entirely new here. The seats are on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co's stores; the box office at the theatre will be open after 10 a. m. on Sunday.

"The Clansman" at the Van Ness

"The Clansman," announced to appear at the Van Ness Theatre on Monday night, November 2d, is claimed to be the most remarkable play on the American stage. Founded on the famous novels, "The Leopard's Spots" and "The Clansman," it was first produced in the Old Dominion State, September 22, 1905. Immediately thereafter it started on a whirlwind tour of the South, in which all records were broken for attendance and for controversy and discussion provoked. "The Clansman" is the first dramatic presentment of the terrible reconstruction period of Southern history. The scenes are laid in the hill country of South Carolina in 1867, when white civilization was in danger of being overthrown by the carpetbaggers and their dupes, the ignorant negroes. Southern chivalry and manhood comes to the front in the person of Ben Cameron, a leader of the Ku-Klux Klan. This gallant youth is in love with the daughter of a Northern fanatic, but he will not sacrifice his principles to win her love. Instead, he tears down the "Social Eqaulity" proclamation which the commanding general of the district has ordered placarded. The Northern party try to sell out the Cameron homestead for fraudulent taxes, but Elsie Stoneman, Ben's sweetheart, buys it in. At last the critical moment arrives for the work of the Ku Klux Klan. They gather at midnight in a mountain cave to perform their awful ritual and execute the solemn functions of a high court of justice. Ben, their leader, is arrested by the carpetbag government and sentenced to death. Elsie, his sweetheart, is promised his life if she will ally herself with the mulatto lieutenant-governor of South Carolina. She faints at the odious proposal, and her father, learning that his protege has thus abused his confidence, denounces the mulatto. At the end of the play and in the nick of time the Ku Klux enter. They have rescued Ben from the clutches of the farcical courtmartial, and led by him they level their revolvers at the villainous lieutenant-governor, making him their prisoner and freeing Elsie Stoneman, who falls into her lover's arms. The play is interpreted by the original company from New York and Chicago.

Strong Play at the Valencia

The final performances of Captain Robert H. Marshall's highly entertaining comedy, "His Excellency, the Governor," will be given at the Valencia Theatre at the Saturday afternoon and evening performances, and Sunday afternoon a decided dramatic novelty will be introduced when "A Navajo's Love" a new and interesting romantic play by Sedley Brown, the capable stage director of the stock company, will be presented for the first time in this city. Although the name "Navajo" may suggest Indians and the "wild" west, it is not a Western nor an Indian play; all of the scenes are laid in and near New York City and "A Navajo's Love" is properly placed in the same category as "The Squaw Man" and "Strongheart." The Indian hero, who is half French and called "Straight Oak" by the Indians, is a man of college education who comes east and makes a fortune on Wall Street. He falls in love with Alice King, daughter of a Wall Street operator, but she is engaged to marry Arthur La Salle, another power in the street. The Indian finds that La Salle has tried to take a mean advantage of him with the girl and determines to ruin him. He accordingly works with all his power in Wall Street and finally has La Salle under his thumb. The great scene shows the Indian, cool and triumphant, and the white man at his feet and begging for mercy. The Indian is determined to accomplish his rival's defeat, when the latter suddenly spies a pistol on the table and recognizes it as the one he had given to the Indian lad years before when he was an army bugler to help him escape from execution. The Indian characteristic is strongly shown when the redskin, thinking now only of the man who had saved his life allows the white man to retrieve his fortune. Incidentally he gives up the girl. She, however, will not listen to the suggestion and the play ends happily with the betrothal of the Indian and the paleface maiden. Robert Warwick will have a singularly strong and gripping part as Straight Oak and Willette Kershaw will be as charming as usual as the society girl whose heart is the coveted prize of two impassioned lovers.

Fantastic Comedy at the Alcazar

"The Road to Yesterday," one of the New York successes last season, will be given its first presentation in San Francisco next week at the Alcazar, commencing Monday night. Its theme, while somewhat similar to that of "When Knights Were Bold," in which Francis Wilson appeared here a few months ago, is ingeniously sustained through a series of fantastic comedy scenes that are marked by daintiness. A modern young girl deplores the lack of chivalry in society as she knows it, and while deploring she falls asleep and dreams. What she dreams consumes two acts in the telling. She is taken back three hundred years, to the Elizabethan era, and meets enough adventure to satisfy the most romantic-minded maiden. Extraordinary scenes and characters are introduced, and the comedy is delicious. Of course when the dreamer awakens she is satisfied that the "age of chivalry" was much less comfortable to live in than the twentieth century, and the final curtain finds her and the audience happy. Evelyn Vaughan will have the role of the dreamer, and it promises to reveal new phases of her art. During the period of her dream she assumes boy's garb, and rehearsals have shown that she will be quite a fascinating figure. Bertram Lytell, as the modern and antique hero, will be seen to splendid advantage.

The De Gogorza Concerts

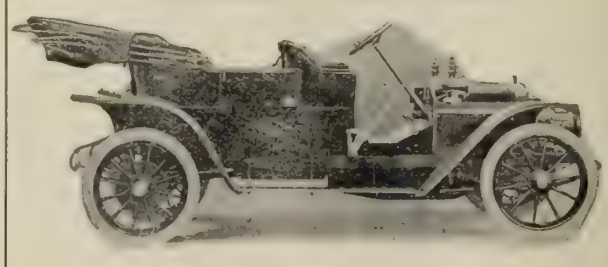
Manager Greenbaum's next musical star will be that splendid singer, Emilio de Gogorza, who furnished the "thrill" at the Emma Eames concerts and who repeated his success at his own recitals two years ago. This artist will give three splendid programs at Christian Science Hall, commencing Sunday, November 8th. The opening program will be composed of works by Caldara, Haendel, Gluck, Schumann, Grieg, Brahms, Massenet, Sidney Homer, Howard Brockway, Horatio Parker, and by special request Manager Greenbaum has added "Mother o'Mine" by Tours. A special feature will be a group of Spanish works by Alvarez and no one sings these like De Gogorza. Henry C. Whittemore will act as both accompanist and piano solist. The second program, equally varied, will be given Thursday night, November 12th, and the popular "Prologue" from "I Pagliacci" is one of the offerings. The final concert will be a request program and will be given Sunday afternoon, November 15th. Complete programs may be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co's, where the sale of seats opens next Wednesday morning, November 4th. De Gogorza will sing in Oakland at Ye Liberty playhouse Friday afternoon, November 13th, the hour being set for 3:30 in order to accommodate school and college pupils and teachers.

New Season of Minetti Concerts

The Minetti String Quartette will give the first concert of their sixteenth season at half past three o'clock Friday afternoon, November 6th, at Century Hall. Every provision has been made to insure the success of the series and several special numbers have been selected that will prove unusually attractive. The program for the first concert is as follows: Haydn, string quartet in D major, op. 20, No. 4; Bach, due for two violins and piano accompaniment; Beethoven, string quartet in F major, op. 18.

Capital Vaudeville at the Orpheum

Next week's program at the Orpheum is an assured success. Chief among the new acts will be George Primrose and his Dancing Boys. This famous minstrel can boast of a popularity that is enduring and it can be said truthfully that "age cannot wither nor custom stale his infinite variety." His graceful dancing is the admiration of all who behold it and his coming entertainment we are assured completely surpasses all his previous efforts The Four Nighton, Olympian gymnasts, who are among the recent European vaudeville sensations, will present an act in which phenomenal strength and gymnastic skill play a great part. Alfred Kelcy, a sterling actor of original yet artistic methods, will appear in a sketch entitled "In Trust." Mr. Kelcy will have the support of that talented young actress Miss Mathilde Bothe. "Slivers," the greatest of all clowns, will be an amusing attraction in the pantomime of his own originating to which he has given the name of "The Ball Game," and in which he plays a solitaire game. He runs after a grounder, quarrels with the umpire, makes faces at the boys on the bleachers, and concludes by "striking out." Artie Nelson, famous as an acrobat and athlete, will be associated with him. Next week will be the last of Valdon, the extraordinary magician, Lewis and Green, Black and Jones, and of that charming comedienne, Hope Booth, in her delightfully niave impersonation of "The Little Blonde Lady." For a finale, a particularly realistic series of motion pictures will be given.



Lively "Little Johnny Jones" Is Here

Those who attend the performance of "Little Johnny Jones" at the American Theatre during the week beginning November 1st, will see an unusually brisk and merry play. The big company, which is about the most successful on tour, is headed by Charlie Brown, playing the title part. He is a clever dancer, a splendid singer and in fact a star in the part. Among the other well cast performers are Amy Mortimer, playing her three different characters very cleverly; Ada Gifford, the "female newspaper man," beautiful to look upon and a clever actress. Mr. Keough, a quaint comedian of original methods, who has invested the character of "The Unknown" with a subtle humor that never fails to win enthusiastic applause. There are more than forty handsome young men and women in the chorus, all specially selected. No prettier girls have been seen in San Francisco. Everything goes with the dash common to Geo. M. Cohan's productions. "Little Johnny Jones" will remain at the American till the close of Saturday evening, November 7th.

The Beringer Musical Club Concert

The Beringer Musical Club, under the direction of Professor and Madame Joseph Beringer, gave its ninth concert Tuesday evening, October 27th, at Lyric Hall. An attractive and varied program made the recital particularly interesting to a very large audience. The following members—Miss Anna Fritz, Mrs. Agnes Burrell, Miss Anita Morse and Miss Frances Westington—rendered their respective numbers with perfect ease, fulfilling many difficult technical requirements with a showing of great skill, accompanied with good expression. Mr. Melton Mowbray, Harry Samuels and Professor Joseph Beringer contributed the rest of the program, the two latter giving Grieg's F major Sonata for violin and piano, which was an unexpected treat to an enthusiastic audience.

PIONEER AUTOMOBILE CO.

524 Twentieth St., Oakland 901 Golden Gate Ave., San Francisco

Auto Notes

That the automobile industry is growing, even beyond the expectations of the dealers and manufacturers two years ago, is evident from the unusually large number of applicants in the interior of the State for the selling agency of small cars. In discussing this phase of the automobile industry yesterday, E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Company, said: "It is surprising the turn the automobile trade has taken last season and this year. With four or five agents last season we thought we had the whole State pretty well covered, but with the introduction of the medium-priced Chalmers-Detroit cars, the would-be dealers in motor cars seem to appear from every town in the State."

G. W. Roberts of Marysville was here this week and took delivery from the Howard Automobile Company of a 30 h. p. four-cylinder Buick roadster. He shipped the machine to Vallejo by boat and accompanied by F. Roberts drove to their home in Yuba County.

Already the largest exclusive motor car factory in the world, the shops of the Packard Motor Car Company of Detroit, Michigan, are again being enlarged by several additions. In the rear of the present double quadrangle of shops, several two-story buildings are now nearing completion. These will be used as additions to the machine and body departments and will also greatly facilitate the manufacture of Packard trucks. The present Packard factory is nearly six times as large as the original plant erected in Detroit in 1903. At that time it contained 100,000 square feet of floor space, which, by successive additions, has been increased to nearly 600,000 square feet, or over fourteen acres. There are now employed 2700 men in the manufacture of 1909 cars.

Colonel and Mrs. F. H. Johnson, with Mr. and Mrs. Chris Jorgenson, left this city Thursday evening for an automobile tour through the Grand Canyon of the Colorado. Mr. Jorgenson is the well known artist of the Yosemite Valley. Mr. Johnson is taking a camera with him and expects to take some fine pictures. The trip will be made in Mr. Johnson's Thomas Flyer.

Mr. C. E. Mathewson, who left for Los Angeles this week to look ever the situation there, remarked that any rival tire company would certainly have to hustle to capture the round-trip San Diego record from the Diamond Tire. The Rambler recently broke the same record by 57 minutes on Diamond tires and Marsh rims and then Hamlin in his Franklin went around the course in Diamond tires in 11 hours and 17 minutes, both records being made without any tire trouble.

Percy J. Brown, of Eureka, Humboldt county, is enjoying many pleasant drives over the boulevards of Alameda county in the 40 h. p. Buick touring car of which he took delivery from the Howard Automobile Company of this city this week. Mr. Brown will spend several weeks familiarizing himself with his new machine before returing to his home in Eureka.

The winning of the Chalmers-Detroit "40" and the Chalmers-Detroit "30" in the respective contests in the sweepstakes race lat Saturday, is considered by the manufacturers to more than prove their claims for the speed and endurance of the machines. The 40 h. p. Chalmers which won the Jericho sweepstate event in the same model with which Bert Dingley broke the world's record at the recent Fresno meet. The small 30 h. p. Chalmers won the 150 mile event for cars costing less than $2000, in a few minutes over three hours.

Ed A. Zeis of Redding, Shasta county, purchased from the Howard Automobile Company this week a two-cylinder Buick touring car. Mr. Zeis is a great sportsman and hunter and will use his car exclusively for pleasure in the wilds of Shasta.

Dr. W. C. Jenney of Vacaville was in San Francisco this week on his way home after an extended tour of the bay counties in his Buick "White Streak."

The Diamond Rubber Co. are in receipt of a very interesting letter from Mr. P. J. Walker, a prominent contractor of this city, who has just completed a very extensive run throughout the European countries in which he states that Diamond tires put on his car on April 14, 1908, in Buffalo, retained the same original air up till September 12th, when the tires were taken off at the same factory, having covered 9,027 miles without a puncture or having a pump touched to them. He further states to all intents and purposes easily 2,000 more miles may be had from the tires before recovering is necessary.

Dr. Otto Westerfield of this city has purchased from the Howard Automobile Company a Buick "White Streak," which he has placed in service in his practice.

One of the most recent comparisons in tire cost was the recent Fairmont Park, Philadelphia, 200-mile race, in which seven cars equipped with Diamond tires had a total tire expense of $9.00, and this charge was occasioned by an inner tube being pinched. Nine other cars, equipped with other makes, had a total tire expense of $841.50.

Henry T. Atkinson & Co., of Oakland, took delivery from the Howard Automobile Company this week of a Buick "White Streak" which they will use in the pursuit of business throughout Alameda County.

The mining men of Nevada are again coming to the front as buyers and users of motor cars. Bob Douglas, who owns a 40 h. p. Thomas car in Fallon, and F. C. Keith, the well known motorist of the sagebrush country, are among the prominent mining men to be interested in new cars. Keith placed his order yesterday with the Pioneer Automobile Company for a six-cylinder 40 h. p. Thomas Flyer. This is the fourth Thomas car owned by Keith.

Letters

On Simple Lines of Love

"Three of a Kind" makes a good combination. Richard Burton's special three would not seem, at first sight, to possess much in common, for they were a middle aged German musician who had bade farewell to ambition, a little waif without home or connections, and a cocker spaniel as homeless as the boy. The kindly old musician, coming home late at night from his employment in a theatre orchestra, was attracted by a fist fight carried on by two diminutive youngsters in a ring of their mates. The younger and smaller of the two combatants attracted the old gentleman's attention partly for his plucky stand against odds and partly by something elusively reminiscent in his attitude and appearance. The chance encounter led to the ripening of interest, with the result that Phil was invited to make his home with Ludovic and to save his earnings from the sale of papers for some useful purpose. The third of the trio introduced himself and made so sure of his welcome that no one could have had the heart to turn him away. This was the little cocker spaniel who attached himself to Phil one wintry afternoon, accompanied him to his attic home, and ingratiated himself with Ludovic so that the musician was as loth to part with him as Phil was. The story, like most of those built on simple lines of love and loyalty, will prove equally pleasing to young and old with the exception, of course, of those whose palates have been destroyed by highly spiced sensations. It is evident, from the dedication, that Dun, the little dog, is more than a figment of the imagination. Published by Little, Brown & Co.

The Problem of Prison Stripes

In penitentiary stripes comes "9009," the prison collaboration of James Hopper and Fred R. Bachdolt, which the all-knowing Bookman has rechristened "Goog." "9009" will take its place beside "The Turn of the Balance" as an exemplification of the failure of penitentiaries to reform their inmates and argument against "making criminals." It will appeal to the sentimentalists and encourage the unconvicted lawbreakers in the belief that they are a special class against whom society has turned its hand and no doubt it will form the basis of lectures and sermons on the monstrous iniquity of punishing virtuous burglars and murderers who are not wicked at all but only sick. As a matter of plain fact our laws are so interpreted and our law breakers so hedged about with a barbed wire fence of technicalities that there is precious little room for doubt that by the time one finally does reach state prison it is because nothing short of death could have rescued him. Mr. Hopper leads us to the hypothesis that John Collins, otherwise "9009," and whom he does not deny to be a criminal of years' standing, would have come forth at the end of his sentence ready to walk the straight and narrow path. It was his first conviction and he was scared—scared of the stripes, of the confinement, of the precautions against escape. But he was going to "be good" to earn his credits and reform forever more. But he found the system of espionage and suspicion such that he was constantly blamed for what he could not help and punished for what he did not do, until, driven to desperation, he made his escape, to all intents and purposes a ferocious animal with but one desire, to satisfy his craving for revenge by blood. With all due respect to Mr. Hooper, and conceding the excellence of his story simply as a recital of trial and adventure, it is necessary for him to remember that no man need be a criminal. Josiah Flynt, who probably knew more about tramps and thieves than anyone outside their own ranks, and who was not without sympathy for them, gave it as his conclusion that criminals, with the exception of the comparatively few who act on sudden impulse, choose their career deliberately. It looks to them as if theft of one degree or another would pay well. They calculate the time they may expect to spend in confinement as no more than the honest workman must sacrifice to sickness and hard times. Dishonesty is going to pay better in the long run, and be infinitely easier and more exciting than honest labor. Of course it does not, and likewise of course a man once convicted of a crime has a hard time to establish his integrity even if he desires to do so. It is easy to place the blame on society, and to clamor that the price has been paid when the sentence has been served, but it is a very ancient saying, based on the fundamental facts of human nature that "the way of the transgressor is hard." There is more than a grain of wisdom in the view of Secretary Bonaparte, that a third conviction is final proof of incorrigibility and should be met with a death sentence. The object of establishing penitentiaries is not solely and entirely to provide a pleasant retreat for criminals, until the memory of their misdeeds grows dim, but to protect society from their depredations and to so influence them that whether through fear of punishment or conversion to righteousness, they will be disinclined to continue their careers of lawlessness. "9009" is published by the McClure Co.

TOWN TALK

THE PACIFIC WEEKLY

THE TALK OF THE TOWN

is the return of "Sunny Jim" and his best of all breakfast foods---the original flaked wheat food that you always liked

"FORCE"

It was always good enough, but now it is better than ever. Made of the choicest wheat that grows, steam-cooked, malted, rolled in thin flakes and baked until it is crisp and delicious.

It pays to Talk when you have something to say. Get the Talking habit by eating a food that is full of Talk. Eat "FORCE" every day in the week no matter what you eat on other days---and you will be at the top-notch of mental vigor and physical power. It is the pre-digested energy of the whole wheat combined with barley malt.

Always crisp it before serving it by pouring it into a pan or earthenware dish and warming it in oven; then serve in large dish with cream, piling the flakes on one side of the dish and pouring the milk in on the other side, dipping the flakes as eaten.

The Verdict

The people have elected to rule through the medium of William Taft; and no longer is the immediate future pregnant with dread misgivings. Notwithstanding President Roosevelt's assurance in one of his latest political epistles that Mr. Taft stands pledged to continue "the definite and constructive programme of social reorganization already entered upon by the present Administration," we do not view the prospect with alarm. Mr. Taft doubtless has ideals similar to those which Mr. Roosevelt professes to have, but a man of Mr. Taft's training and education is not likely to adopt the methods of his sponsor; nor is a man of Mr. Taft's temperance of thought and conservatism of disposition likely to give the weight of his authority to such vagaries as have lately disturbed the tranquillity of this country. Despite the fact that the people, confronted with the terrifying alternative of Bryanism, were constrained to refrain from rebuking the Republican President for his calamitous activity as a reformer of the universe the probability is that after the inauguration of Mr. Taft the Republican party, which, in the Chicago Convention, affirmed its unwavering loyalty to the Constitution, will resume allegiance to its traditional policies and disdain to conciliate the promoters of hysteria and inciters of class hatred. We believe that Mr. Taft will represent intelligently the people's wishes and effectively promote their interests. This it is possible for him to do even without repudiating the policies which he has promised to carry out; for after all the policies are not so objectionable as the methods employed by Mr. Roosevelt to make them the law of the land. There is no danger of Mr. Taft's attempting to gain his ends by holding the judiciary up to execration, suspending laws, violating the Constitution and exercising the power of suggestion to overcome with obloquy everybody that refuses to bow to his will. At the close of Mr. Roosevelt's term we hope to see the morbidity of Rooseveltism eradicated from the body politic and the common industry and productivity renewed. As for the Bryan superstition we hope that has been dissipated, and that the Democracy will soon show an interest once more in the Jeffersonian ideals of self respect and love of constitutional principles.

A Fatal Obsession

Many honest but unsophisticated citizens went to the polls last Tuesday with the impression that Judge Dunne embodied a principle which it is important for them to uphold. Good easy men, they were told that Judge Dunne was the object of the hostility of dangerous, lawless rogues and that his defeat would mean popular acquiescence in practices which are abhorrent to a sense of civic decency; and they believed. It is hardly reasonable to find fault with them for their credulity. Judge Dunne's campaign was conducted with great zeal, without scruple and with much ingenuity and boldness of assertion. Those by whom it was conducted represent themselves to be eager to improve the morals of this community and to punish men for crimes against the municipality. Color is given to their pretensions by the circumstance that they are giving aid and support to officials who appear to be engaged in vindicating justice and resisting the criminal machinations of desperate rascals. With so much that was conducive to the formation of sentiment in favor of Judge Dunne it is not to be wondered at that he received a large vote. There are some people who can be fooled all the time and evidently they abound in San Francisco. Some day perhaps these people will be enlightened with respect to Judge Dunne and the theatricalities which were employed in his behalf with a fine instinct for psychological effect; perhaps the whole truth will be flashed upon their minds, enabling them to realize how grievously they erred.

The Struggles of the Octopus

Mr. W. B. Strand, a railroad man of thirty-five years' experience and the author of a very interesting and instructive article on railroads and their struggle for existence, says: "After ten years of the greatest prosperity this country has ever enjoyed ten months of financial depression finds nearly all the railroads of the country on the verge of bankruptcy." Nothing easier of explanation than this, the railroad-baiter of politics and the demagogue of journalism will tell us. Their explanation is that the railroads are overcapitalized—too much water in them. As a matter of fact the average capitalization of American railroads is only $61,000 a mile, while those of Great Britain are capitalized at an average of over $260,000 a mile. Moreover, freight rates in England are nearly five times as high as ours. While railroad baiting continues to be a popular pastime in this country Canada is subsidizing her railroads and doing everything she can to encourage their construction. There is demand for fully 200,000 miles of railroads in this country, but with every State having an idea of how a railroad should conduct its business, and with small-fry politicians at Washington stimulating agitation against railroads, it is no longer an easy matter to induce financiers to hazard their money in the transportation business. If the railroads were making as much money as the demagogues would have us believe it would not be necessary, as Mr. Strand suggests, to indulge in the common practice of declaring unearned dividends and juggling earnings and expenditures in order to make a favorable financial showing and to make securities salable. It is a matter of general knowledge that the railroads are finding it pretty hard to raise money to meet their present needs and are projecting very few new lines, despite the demand for extensions into new territory. It is a matter of common notoriety that the New York Central, Pennsylvania, Erie and other trunk lines are flooding the market with short-time notes, and yet the demagogues are calling for more stringent regulations and for the reduction of rates. If the money being raised was for extending lines long term bonds could be issued to raise funds, but the fact is the money is needed to carry on general business and make necessary repairs and improvements. According to Mr. Strand, passenger and freight rates have been forced down until today there isn't a railroad in the United States that is earning enough to make an adequate return on the money invested. A small minority are just about able to meet their fixed charges, while a good many roads have kept out of bankruptcy only by mortgaging and remortgaging not only all their assets but their future earnings as well. All our railroad magnates have not been as successful as Harriman and Hill; all have not made millions, though all have more or less aided in building cities, developing territories into States and adding hundreds of millions of dollars to the wealth and commerce of the country. If all roads were prosperous, as Mr. Strand observes, none would be mortgaging future earnings; nor would railroad securities be losing prestige among investors both in this country and Europe. "No concern," says Mr. Strand, "in a healthy financial condition would have to resort to desperate expedients to raise money, and when we find the railroads resorting to every conceivable financial plan to raise money we know that they are not making any." And he adds: "The passing of dividends, the talk of receiverships, the cancellation of equipment contracts, the suspension of all improvements and extensions, except where absolutely necessary, are surely not the signs of prosperity. When railroads cut down the expenses of operation and maintenance to a point where their neglect to make repairs becomes almost criminal, and the handling of passengers dangerous, they certainly are traveling a rough road, for safety of travel is a trade mark that every railroad is most anxious to acquire." Mr. Strand presents the railroads in a somewhat desperate plight. Is the picture overdrawn? In view of the recent wholesale curtailment of expenses on the Harriman lines in this State; of projected lines deferred and of widespread measures of stringent economy, we doubt that anybody will conscientiously say that Mr. Strand has been guilty of misrepresentation. Nor, in view of the frantic and costly efforts being made in our midst to finance a brand new railroad, the ultimate success of which is guaranteed in the most solemn rhetoric, do we believe that anybody is insensible of the fact that capitalists are no longer eager to invest their money in the most important and the worst berated of public utilities.

The Ogre Transformed

The recent defeat of the three cent car fare franchise in Cleveland and the turning down of the anti-railroad forces in Georgia and the election of a Governor who is friendly to the railroads are regarded by Mr. Strand as signs that the people are awakening to the fact that they have been pressing the railroads too hard. This is probably a case of the wish being father to the thought. Signs that indicate public sentiment in Ohio and Georgia are not infallible guides to public sentiment in the rest of the country. In our opinion not without a great deal of missionary work will the people all over the country come to a realization of the importance of encouraging railroad builders. To counteract the effect of demagogic preachments railroad magnates in all sections of the country must follow the example of E. H. Harriman, who but recently perceived the advisability of taking the public into his confidence. For many years Mr. Harriman held himself aloof from the common herd, and either from insensibility or indifference permitted the demagogues to go as far as they liked in misrepresenting his performances and aims and instilling abhorrence of his personality. Gradually he took the shape of an ogre in the public mind, and the suspicion prevailed that nothing but human misery was grateful to him. Weighted down with calumny, at length it dawned on Mr. Harriman that it is not wise for a quasi-public servant to sequester himself from the sovereign people and act as though he didn't care a tinker's imprecation what they thought of him or of his activities. Thereupon he emerged from his isolation, and with very little experience in the practice of amiability he became a very good "mixer." The people were pleased to meet Mr. Harriman and to find that he was entirely human. In the role of itinerant preacher of the advantages of encouraging railroad building and the folly of encouraging railroad baiters, if he has not revolutionized public sentiment he has at least assuaged some of the hostility from which he has suffered. But Mr. Harriman should not be expected to do all the missionary work. There are other railroad magnates who have not yet learned the folly of the public-be-damned policy. To offset the vociferations of the tireless promoters of envy and hatred they must emerge and mix.

Naval Programmes

If we are to keep ourselves in the first rank of World Powers, as Mr. Richard Pearson Hobson advises out of great apprehension for the peace and integrity of the nation, we must go farther than ever that dithyrambic alarmist urges in the matter of enlarging the navy. With great difficulty Congress was persuaded at its last session to sanction the laying down of two Dreadnoughts this year, and yet there are World Powers of the second class that have undertaken a far more expensive programme. Great Britain is sticking to her programme of maintaining a navy larger than the combined navies of any two nations, but Germany seems intent upon disarranging the plans of her great commercial rival. In March of this year the Reichstag passed a bill which calls for the laying down of four Dreadnoughts annually for the four years 1908-11 and for the construction in the years 1812-17 of six armored cruisers of the Indomitable class, which are battleships in all but name, and which will cost about ten million dollars apiece. But the German Navy League, which abounds in Hobsons, is not satisfied even with so ambitious a programme, and it is now believed that on the strength of the League's recommendation the Reichstag will soon decide to order the immediate construction of the six armored cruisers. At present Germany has no Dreadnought, while England has two, and eight building. Germany has five building, and the United States four. Recent events in the Balkan States will doubtless stimulate naval expansion throughout Europe, as it is now more clear than ever that treaties are not worth the paper they are written on. Peace congresses have received a blow from which they will not soon recover. Despite the march of civilization the barbarian maxim that preparedness for war is the best guaranty of peace still holds good.

Pasturage for the Historian

Roosevelt. The American Plutarch or Seutonius who writes The Lives of the Presidents will linger fondly over the newspaper files of this period so rich are they in fascinating data illuminative of the mind and heart of one of the most interesting of epoch-makers. An object of the highest legitimate curiosity is the innermost character of a great popular idol, and there is nothing more fascinating than to have it subjected to our examination, to trace it through all the stages of its development, to survey its animating principles and thus to gather that knowledge of mankind which is best obtained through the study of men. And what an intimate study may be made of Theodore Roosevelt—thanks to the garrulities that have resulted from his unsurpassed incontinence of tongue and pen! No Egyptian obscurity rests upon the facts of his career. In the broad river of utterances sourced in this picturesque personality is to be found the lucid mirror of himself. Will the judgment formed in the effulgent part of his career be revised? In the summing up of him will there be more of dyslogy than eulogy? Of late many judgments have been revised, and today in all sections of the country the President is execrated by men who once regarded him as a patriot and pronounced him the equal of Lincoln in sincerity and achievement. There is a prodigious disparity between the opinions of men respecting the character and performances of Mr. Roosevelt. By one class he is regarded as the great apostle of reform, as an inflexible patriot and stern moralist who awakened the public conscience and checked abuses that with torrential force were sweeping the institutions of the country from their moorings; by the other he is pronounced a political mountebank who has given greater impetus to ostentatious and artificial sentiments than to the salutary dictates of patriotism; who has deluded and inflamed our minds with pharisaical notions of superior wisdom and superior virtue; who has been more successful in arousing the passions of envy and distrust than in animating men to the virtues which are essential to the preservation of the Republic. But contemporary opinion is not of much value. It is almost always influenced by personal prejudice or partisan bias. The only judgment of any value is that which is formed with a knowledge of the results produced by the person judged; that which has had the advantage of the perspective of years in which true proportion is revealed. What the judgment will be respecting Mr. Roosevelt we can only speculate. Of one thing we are fairly certain: that historians will find much to interest them in the literature of the campaign of 1908. And, perhaps, in all the prodigious mass of printed matter they will find nothing so intensely interesting as the President's letter to Senator Knox. In this letter they will find it asserted by the President that the blacklist and the secondary boycott are "two of the most cruel forms of oppression ever devised by the wit of man for the infliction of suffering on his weaker fellows." As, before reaching this letter, the historian will have become familiar with the President's attitude toward organized labor, the foregoing sentiment will give him pause. Knowing that Mr. Roosevelt formerly openly advocated the legalization of the secondary boycott; that after the decision of the Supreme Court in the Danbury hat case he suspended the operations of the Sherman anti-trust law so that organized labor might not be molested while enforcing the secondary boycott, the historian will probably throw up his hands and exclaim, "This is the limit!" But after reading the whole letter he will conclude that so far as Mr. Roosevelt was concerned audacity was without bounds. He will find that there were many things which Mr. Roosevelt denounced to which within twelve months he had given his enthusiastic advocacy. In the Knox letter Mr. Roosevelt actually denounced Mr. Bryan and Mr. Gompers for questioning the impartiality of the Federal judiciary in labor disputes. In all history is there another such example of brazen hypocrisy on the part of the ruler of a civilized people? In all the history of this country can there be named a single individual who did more toward impairing confidence in the Federal judiciary than Theodore Roosevelt? He has repeatedly asserted that the power of injunction "has been used to the grave injury of the rights of laboring men." When the decision of Judge Landis in the Standard Oil case was reversed he imputed sinister motives to the Court of Appeal. When his ridiculous Employers' Liability Law was pronounced unconstitutional he took occasion to asperse the court. In the Republican national convention of last June he opposed the efforts of a group of lawyers to embody in the Republican platform a declaration of continued confidence in the Federal Courts. How are the historians who seek to understand the motives of this statesman to decipher the mystery of his feats as a political acrobat—how are they to account for his effrontery in publicly censuring men for stimulating passions which he in his frenzy and rage incited? Some historian may be able to throw light on the matter; we cannot. We are tolerably familiar with the sublime mad men who have troubled the world at long intervals, but Theodore Roosevelt is a problem beyond our powers of solution. And still more puzzling to us is the patience of the public. The obsession so far as we are concerned began to relax when we read the whole controversy involving the "Dear Maria" letters; and it was entirely dissipated when we came to realize the audacity of the letter to Alton B. Parker denouncing him for making charges the truth of which has been established beyond a scintilla of doubt. But despite revelation after revelation; notwithstanding disclosures conclusive of insincerity and hypocrisy; of acts abhorrent to a sense of decorum and dignity; of utterances demoralizing in their effect on the public mind; of usurpations of power and perversions of privileges; in short, notwithstanding abundant proof of the fact that a smaller or less qualified person had never been placed by the caprices of fate amid great affairs he held his sway as the universal arbiter, esteemed by the people and accepted by them as the proper source of all inspiration in matters pertaining to the civic well-being. The phenomenon is surely worthy of the attention of the philosophic historian. We believe that he will pronounce judgment to the effect that if ever a people exhibited the symptoms of downright madness or utter stupidity they were those symptoms revealed in the homage paid by the people of the United States to Theodore Roosevelt.

The Menace

By Elsa Baker

When I remember, Love, that but for thee
  My homeless spirit still would wander lone,
    Alien in this inhospitable zone;
Upon the globe of Time, when rapturously
I touch the gleaming jewel of unity—
  Whose dual rays are thy soul and my own—
  Then do I tremble lest the masked unknown
Brigand of Death snatch thee away from me.

All other perils we can brave together,
  Challenging them to part us. But beyond
    The shifting boundaries of the realm of breath
Are many dangers and uncertain weather.
  Nothing can rend our Nature-woven bond

Romance of Old Spain

Containing Encouragement from an Unexpected Quarter for Those Literary Ladies Who Would Devote Well-Earned Leisure from Sordid Duty to the Contemplation of a Period When Chivalry and the Heroic Qualities Were More in Vogue Than They Are in This Age of Brass, Bluff and Brummagem.

By Democritus

I commend the judgment of the ladies of the Clionian Club in selecting Spanish literature and architecture as themes for their discourse. It is not often that the women of our clubs go so far afield to seek intellectual pabulum. Most of them are content to browse on the greener pastures at their own doors. In literature the latest seller suffices for the ordinary clubwoman; because the latest seller is temporarily familiar to every woman of "culture and refinement." Mark my quotations in this connection. I use them because my favorite newspaper writers never write of "culture" without coupling "refinement" with it; never taking it for granted or allowing it to be taken for granted that refinement is the complement of culture, or admitting of the doubt that a refined person may not be cultured. Why intimate knowledge of the latest sellers should presuppose "culture and refinement" in the clubwoman I don't know; but I am credibly informed that it does.

These Clionians are evidently something more than the ordinary clubwomen. They are not at all satisfied with the inspiration of the latest sellers. They hark back to the hoar and musty products of mediaevalism; they shake the dusty tapestries of old romance; they prowl about in the haunted twilight of ancient attics, graping amid the rubbish of the dead years and peering into dark and forgotten corners searching for the ghosts of long-sepulchred literature. Alas, that when the session is ended the call of the kitchen should sound retreat to oversee or prepare the evening meal for a hungry husband homeward plodding his weary way from the marts of trade where men scramble for dollars, all unheedful of the intellectual pastime of their poet-questing high-browed wives and daughters.

In a recent seance whereat the spirits of the mighty dead were evoked, one of the Clionians raised the ghost of Pedro Calderon de la Barca whose name was printed back end to in the newspaper report; a sort of fame analgous to that described by Byron who insisted that the most lasting notoriety attached to those who get into the newspapers with their names spelled wrongly. Calderon was indeed a great playwright; his drama of the sword and cloak has furnished the basis of nearly all the romantic drama since his day and the best intrigue of the modern drama of plot and counterplot is derived from his comedy. I hope that the Calderonian Clionian paid just tribute to this eminently Spanish artificer. He was not nearly as prolific as his early contemporary, Lope de Vega; he wrote only a hundred and twenty tragedies and comedies, a hundred or so of sacred allegorical pieces, a hundred humorous interludes, and nearly a hundred other pieces not dramatic. Compared with Lope de Vega this was but a windfall in the olive orchards of Barcelona to the autumn leaves that strew the forest shaded slopes of Vallombrosa. Lope de Vega was a very busy man. He wrote more than 1500 plays besides 300 autos sacramentales and a vast quantity of interludes, curtain-raisers, one-act farces, monologues, epilogues and preludes. This work was accomplished in exile, in the intervals of his arduous service with the Armada, and as leisurely relaxation from his duties as a member of the Spanish Inquisition. It may be said that Lope de Vega invented the Spanish drama and that all other dramatists have been beholden to him for much of their success in the merely mechanical details of their art; no dramatist has achieved fame without knowledge of some of the tricks of the trade as practiced by Lope Felix de Vega Carpio.

I would not detract from the merit of Calderon in this comparison with his elder contemporary. Calderon was only less nimble with his pen; that was all. If he had written as much as Vega did he would probably have produced a few pieces as worthy as the best that flowed from the ink-horn of Alva's secretary, equal, perhaps to those that dripped from the pen of the marine of the Armada, and as edifying as those that were written by the Inquisitor after a matinee in the rack-room of the inquisitorial heresy department.

Another Clionian discussed the work of Gabriel Tellez, otherwise Tirso de Molina, and sometimes Tirso de Motina, who created the character of Don Juan upon the dramatic models prescribed by Vega. My data as to the Clionian discourse on this subject are meager and inexact; but I presume that the lady trailed Don Juan to his lair in the "Deceiver of Seville," of Tellez; which is contrary to my vague recollection that the original of the grotesque libertine cavorted and swaggered in an old Spanish play entitled "Atheista Fulminato," formerly, and perhaps still acted in the churches and monasteries of Spain, always pursuing with villainous success the fairest of maidens, invariably inviting the statue of the murdered commandant to supper, and inevitably disappearing amid blue flames and a smell of brimstone, to abide forever in hell, while his innumerable caravan of victims appeared in a tableau of heavenly beatitude.

I am glad, however, that the Clionians have been made more familiarly acquainted with Don Juan than they have been from reading Byron's inadequate and somewhat admiring poetical concept of that wholly inestimable character. The ladies of the club now know this fellow in all his wickedness, and it is valuable knowledge in conjunction with that acquired for the purpose of appeasing the hungry appetite of the homeward plodding husband and the dollar-chasing parent who would not recognize Don Juan if he should come to the office with a letter of introduction from a valued correspondent in Madrid or Seville.

It is pleasing to note this Clionian interest in all this forgotten Spanish literature. No doubt it is a relaxation from the humdrum, prosaic, unromantic routine of Clionian home life. There are no swords nowadays, and even the walking stick substitute is relegated to the curled youth of the rialto and the old fashioned gentleman who carries it over his arm when he is not supporting his tottering footsteps. The cloak of the Spanish drama is no longer a part of men's apparel, and even the women seldom wear it except on opera nights and other gala occasions. No more within his hall of Burgos does the king prepare his feast, and make his preparation for many a noble guest bidden to make merry on the Campeador's wedding day; Layn Calvo, the Lord Bishop, comes not forth the gate, nor behind him walketh Ruy Diaz, in all his bridal state; no arch is reared from house to house all over, hung thick with lances, and shields, and glittering helms, brought by the Campeador from out the Moorish realms; it is not now the custom to scatter olive branches and rushes on the streets, and the ladies do not fling down garlands at the Campeador's feet from tapestried and 'broidered balconies; nor with antics and with fooleries, with shouting and with laughter, do they fill the streets of Burgos, while the devil he comes after, hired by the king for sixteen maravedis, with horn on head and hoofs for toes to terrify the ladies. Nothing of this sort or of any other pageant, comedy, love-tale and romantic delirium of "lutes, laurels, seas of milks and ships of amber," can find place in the lives of those who have lived to partake of the responsibility that devolves on the twentieth century wife or daughter whose first thought is of the larder and of its relation to the hunger-need of the weary, homeward-plodding husband or father. Let us rejoice, therefore, that the Clionians have lifted the veil that shrouds the Spanish past, revealing to our enraptured and longing gaze the heroes of Castilian antiquity and the heroines of Andalusian story; Count Lucanor, Amadis of Gaul, Bernardo del Carpio, Sancho Diaz, Count of Saldana, Alfonso the Chaste and his sister, the stately Ximena, Don Roderic, Cyprian of the "Wonderful Magician," Justina, the Marguerite of the Spanish drama, the Valiant Cespedes, and Don Juan, the only vestige of Spanish chivalry that Cervantes could not laugh into semi-oblivion.

The Ruby

Paul Freysin, thirty-two years old.
Claire Freysin, twenty-four years old.
Andre Brignon, thirty-eight years old.
A Cabman.
A Servant.

Half-past seven at the Freysin's; a pretty dining room, rather lavishly furnished; M. and Mme. Freysin, seated opposite each other at table, have just begun dinner.

Claire—You do not seem to have much appetite?

Paul—I helped myself twice to sole.

Claire—You seem preoccupied. What are you thinking about?

Paul—About you. (To the servant, who has just brought in a dish and is listening slyly.) Leave us.

He goes out.

Claire—What kept you so late?

Paul—I had a lot of things to do.

Claire—What were they?

Paul—They would not interest you.

Claire—I'll wager you spent at least ten francs for cab hire.

Paul—No, I didn't take a cab at all.

Claire—You walk! You! As lazy as you are?

Paul—Yes, I walked.

Claire—Walked afoot?

Paul—The whole time. I must have walked ten miles. The sun was shining and I felt just like a good spin. It was delightful.

Claire—Where did you go?

Paul—Straight ahead—to the auction hall, to the club—

Claire—Didn't you go to Andre's?

Paul—To Brignon's? No, I keep that for rainy days.

Claire—I asked you to go there and inquire about Jeanne—she has had an attack of neuralgia.

Paul—I had other places to go besides the Brignon's.

Claire—They are very good friends of our, awfully good-hearted—

Paul—Yes, they have hearts of gold, I don't dispute it. Why didn't you go there?

Claire—I didn't go out till a quarter of an hour before dinner. I had things to do at home all the afternoon. Otherwise, of course, I would have gone. And it was Jeanne's birthday, day before yesterday—we forgot to send her a remembrance. It's your fault; you should have thought of it.

Paul—Why in the world should I remember Mme. Brignon's birthday, when I sometimes forget even yours? I have no memory for such things.

Claire—The cases are not the same. I am your wife, you don't have to be as attentive to me as you do to strangers. And for such devoted friends as the Brignons—

The Servant comes in again with an aggressively delighted manner, as if he were presenting a bill.

Paul—Well, what is it?

Servant—It's a cabman.

Paul (surprised)—A cabman?

Servant—Yes, sir. There's a cabman in the kitchen, and he says he wants a word with monsieur—no one else will do.

Claire (to the Servant)—What is it about?

Servant—He won't tell anybody but monsieur, madame.

Paul (angrily)—I don't understand this at all. I'll go and see about it.

Claire—No, it is not your place to go to the kitchen. (To the Servant) Bring him up here. (The Servant goes out. To her husband) Are you sure you haven't mislaid or lost anything today?

Paul—Oh, quite sure. We'll see what it is. (With forced gaiety, to hide his uneasiness) This interests me.

Claire—Me too. (The Servant has no sooner brought in the Cabman than Paul turns pale, and shows signs of nervousness. Claire, who is watching him, takes notice of this). Are you ill, my dear?

Paul—Not at all. (To the Servant) Go, you may leave us. (The Servant goes out—he will listen at the door. To the Cabman) What do you want?

Cabman (grinning good naturedly)—Don't monsieur remember me?

Paul (emphatically)—Not at all.

Cabman—That ain't so astonishing, monsieur wasn't paying attention. The fares never look at us, but we always look at the fares, and it was me that monsieur engaged.

Paul—You?

Cabman (pointing to Claire)—Monsieur was with madame.

Claire (pierced by the most horrible suspicions, smilingly to her husband)—Why certainly, don't you remember? Where are your wits?

Cabman—Ah, madame remembers me, doesn't she?

Claire—Perfectly.

Paul—But, I say——

Claire (authoritatively, looking her husband straight in the eye)—Let the man speak.

Claire (to the Cabman)—Well?

Paul—Oh, come, come! Will you explain to me——?

Claire—No! (To the Cabman) Go on.

Cabman (to Mme. Freysin), drawing from his pocket a small article wrapped up in his handkerchief—Well, then, I just came around to give you back your earring you lost just now.

Paul—But that isn't——

Claire (to her husband)—Be silent! (To the Cabman) So it was you—it was you who found it?

Paul—But——

Claire (to her husband)—I tell you to be silent!

Cabman—Is madame satisfied?

Claire (who has taken the jewel, a ruby surrounded by brilliants)—Yes, and my husband is, too. Just think, such a handsome ruby! (She examines it.) Yes, that is it—it must have come unfastened in the cab.

Cabman—Yes, I found it just after monsieur got out.

Claire—Well, how did you know——?

Paul (who cannot remain in his seat)—What is the good of all this? It only makes us late.

Claire—No, wait! I want to know. It amuses me.

Paul, conquered, sits down in great dejection.

Cabman—Madame remembers that you both engaged me at three o'clock near the gate of the Park Monceau, and then we made a trip through the Bois, the lakes Longchamps, Saint James——

Paul—Yes, yes—we haven't asked you to tell us about all that. We know it. You're not telling us anything new.

Claire—Undoubtedly. But I tell you it amuses me all the same.

Heroic Struggle of the Cretans

By L. V. Antonelli

Immediately after the explosion which occurred in the Balkan States a few weeks ago it was reported that the people of Crete had announced their union with Greece. What the Cretans have been doing since it is hard to say. The despatches have thrown very little light on the subject. And as for Europe, preoccupied as she is with the fortunes of one of her largest units, she has little attention to spare for her smallest. But the Cretans are worth considering. They have been almost as troublesome to Europe as the Irish have been to Great Britain. The rebellious plaint of Crete is one which Europe has heard so often for the space of three generations that it irritates and worries her, and grown to a certain degree callous, she treat it, like the idle gods, as a tale of little meaning. None the less it is an "ancient tale of wrong," which does not become any less well founded as it becomes more ancient; and it has a serious meaning not always understood for lack of acquaintance with the historical background of it.

Five years is Crete's normal interval between revolutions. The islanders it is said have been from all time false and graceless. There is no contenting them. What they have or have not deserved is a contentious question. How far the fate of Crete can be separated from that of the Ottoman Empire without making serious international trouble is of far more importance than the discontent of one Mediterranean island. When the Christian population of the Morea rose against the Turks in 1821, the Cretan Christians, being three-fourths of the inhabitants of the island, rose with them. They had precisely the same reasons for rising; they began and carried out their revolt in precisely the same way, in the same spirit, and with the same general idea; they identified their cause completely with that of the mainland, acted in concert with the insurgents of the Morea and Archipelago, and proposed, if successful, to maintain forever the same community with them which they had already proclaimed. They quickly made their pretension at least as good as did the Peloponnesians. By the end of the year no Moslems remained in any part of the interior; the fortified coast towns were alone holding out, like Patras and Nauplia in the Morea; and the Christians had established an independent provisional government, which was supreme over nine-tenths of the island. Nor did they, from the beginning to the end of the War of Greek independence, make a general submission. The Sultan, unable after two years to recover any of his lost ground, called in his Viceroy of Egypt, promising him the Candiote pashalik de jure if by his own efforts he could get possession of it de facto. In this Mahmud II. anticipated by just two years the arrangement of despair which he would make with the same Viceroy about the Morea. The history of the Egyptian effort in Crete also anticipated very exactly the history of the Egyptian effort on the mainland. Mehemet Ali's troops overran the island again and again, but it always rose behind them. The insurgent government never abjured its functions, and when Codrington persuaded and Maison forced the Egyptians to leave the Morea in 1828, the interior of Crete was still in full rebellion and the Viceroy, failing in the following January to revictual the towns, in face of the Greek fleet, offered to return his unacquired acquisition to his suzerain. In 1829, when the Powers, who had long ago recognized the insurgent Greeks as belligerents, occupied themselves with the consummation of Greek hopes, the Cretan Christians were successful belligerents on precisely the same footing as the Moreotes and with precisely the same object in view. They were one in the tradition of eight years and the hope of all time to come with that new Hellenic nation, whose actual and future existence had been explicity recognized by the concert of the Greater Powers—Russia, France and Great Britain.

Naturally they expected that in the final settlement there would be but one Hellas containing themselves, The demand made to Europe by the Greek Assembly, over which Capodistria was lately come to preside, included Crete, with the same assurance as the Morea. There were admitted doubts about the northern limit of the free state to be, but none about the southern. Nevertheless, to the surprise of almost every one and the consternation of all Greece, the Protecting Powers barred Crete from the first as they also barred Samos, and resolutely refused to listen to the outcry which was raised on all sides. So loud was that outcry that it affected all the future fortunes of Greece by depriving it of the leadership of the future king of the Belgians.

The Russophobes were forced from one point to another. First, they had to give up all idea of an indemnity for the beaten Turk; second, the original limitation of the new state to the Morea and the coastal islands was stretched, by the bold action of Church in Central Greece, first to the line from Lamia to the mouth of the Aspro, and finally to that from Arto to Volo. Why the Powers, or rather two out of the three "Protectors," with the strong approval of Austria, guided by Metternich, were obdurate on the subject of Crete is well known. The island was sacrificed to the Russophobes in the British Cabinet. They argued that if a new Christian State must come into being in the flank of Turkey it should not be increased by a foot of land that could be denied to it. After two years of bartering the Greeks, deprived of Capodistria, were fain to take what they could get, and alas! threw up the game without stipulating on behalf of their brothers in arms of Crete and Samos, for more than political amelioration. So in defiance of all international justice and contrary to obvious political expediency Samos and Crete were left outside the pale. As soon as the Hellenic kingdom was an established fact Samos was conciliated and ameliorated, but not so the Cretans. They were offered a few privileges which they acquiesced in as a condition of continued existence, and never ceased to urge their claim to share in the full freedom of the Hellenic kingdom. Within ten years a part of the population was in arms again, and this time the insurgents refused a further measure of autonomy for fear it might delay indefinitely the realization of their true desire. They preferred to lay down their arms in 1841 and remain as before.

Those arms rusted for a quarter of a century. Encouraged by the vague promises and assurances of the consuls the Cretan Christians waited and hoped. They saw at Sebastapol France and Great Britain extinguish their last hope of help from the Czar; and having already watched the failure of an insurrection in Northern Greece they received with an indifference, which from their point of view was deserved, Abdul Mejid's firman of 1856 in favor of his rajahs and the famous Hatti Humayun. Finally, they heard that the Seven Islands, which had taken no part in the War of Independence, sacrificed nothing and suffered nothing, but had united to the Hellenic kingdom at their own request, in order to increase the popularity of the new king chosen by the Powers. Then they rose, and began, in 1866, the greatest of all Cretan insurrections. In the course of that three years' war the islanders showed a determination, a devotion and an indifference to suffering and terrorism which redeemed many sordid episodes of their modern history; and not only those qualities, but also an ability in guerilla fighting which at one time brought the Turks so low that the Porte, by the mouth of Ali Pasha, the Grand Vizier, offered Samian autonomy to the island if it would abjure its demand for union with Greece. It should not be forgotten now that the Cretans deliberately refused that offer and declared that, as in 1821, they had risen for Union, not for Home Rule. Doubtless they had good reason to suspect the Turk's good faith, knowing well what the devil will promise when sick. But, whether or no, the fact remains that they flatly refused then the concession for which Europe thinks they ought to be humbly grateful now.

The huge armies which the Powers allowed Ali Pasha to throw into Crete wore down its resistance by 1869, and to quiet public outcry in Europe, a measure of much modified autonomy was presently promulgated; but, once again, for want of other guarantee than the diplomatic assurances of the Porte, it resulted in no beneficent change. Thereafter, up to their rising en masse in 1897, the islanders never ceased to agitate and disturb the peace. Theirs was always the old cry, Union and nothing less than Union. Discouraged by the Congress of Constantinople, they rose sporadically during the Russo-Turkish War, in the hope of being regarded as belligerents at its close; but the Congress of Berlin once more offered them certain domestic privileges only. This time, and for the first time, the Cretans formally accepted the offer without further protest, and expressed their gratitude, the fact being that, in common with the rest of the world, they believed the Sick Man to be nearing his last agony. Like the rest of the world, they had yet to appreciate the vitality of Turkey and the ability and determination of its new ruler. They soon realized their mistake, and after 1883 repeatedly formulated the old demand for Union.

These hopes have been imbibed by two generations with their mother's milk. After immense efforts and sacrifices they seemed on the brink of fulfillment in 1899. Six years later the islanders found Europe not only making no visible effort to realize them, but repudiating their ideal, and continually fixing her attention elsewhere. They are as deaf to argument and reason as any lover, and not less hasty and reckless of consequences.

The Spectator

Grant and Wright

From San Diego comes the news that Presidential Elector Ulysses S. Grant has succeeded in borrowing enough money to complete the construction of his big hotel. This "extinguished son of a distinguished sire," as he was called after his unsuccessful campaign for United States Senator, has not been taking an active interest in politics of late, being preoccupied with his hotel enterprise, but in the south he is still regarded as "available Senatorial timber." In the days of his active candidacy he had money to burn, and for the experience which he acquired he sacrificed a great deal of the long green on the altar of his ambition, but without any visible signs of mental anguish. Though he lost the fight he won a reputation for gameness. It was during the Grant Senatorial campaign, by the way, that Howard Wright distinguished himself as Speaker of the Assembly. There were half a dozen candidates in the fight and Wright succeeded in voting for all of them without impairing either his self-esteem or his exchequer. Wright left town shortly after the adjournment of the legislature. He bobbed up again a few weeks ago in the guise of a book agent, and a wag remarked that probably the ex-Speaker thought that as Grant was again seeking political honors there was no place like home.

Stunned Nevada Republicans

The sudden appearance of Tom Fitch, the old-time silver tongued orator, on the local stump last week, created some surprise among Fillmore street politicians, but the sagebrush State solons stuck their tongues in their cheeks and said nothing. For some time past Fitch has been a conspicuous figure among the old war horses that have foregathered in Reno. During the recent campaign the Nevada Republican State Central Committee selected him along with other notable orators to stump the State and harvest votes for Taft and the Republican State ticket. All went well until one evening at a big gathering in Goldfield, when Fitch suddenly paused in his address, made a half apology for what he was going to say, and plunged into a spirited attack on the State Police Bill. That measure was the particular pet of the Republican machine and all its henchmen had been working vigorously in its support throughout the campaign. Fitch's scathing denunciation of the bill fell like a bombshell among the figure heads of the party decorating the platform behind the orator. They didn't want to create a scene and add to the blunder so they choked their spleen till the meeting closed. Then behind the scenes there occurred a fine old party row and scars were given that will never heal. The wires fairly hissed with the charges sent to Chairman Humphrey of the Republican State Central Committee and the decision was authoritatively announced that Tom Fitch had appeared for the last time on the stump for the Republican party in Nevada. Fitch, however, is still a mettlesome war horse and declines to be barred in any such fashion. Forthwith he came to this city, tendered his services to the State Central Committee and was promptly turned loose on the Republican folds.

Swinging Nevada Into Line

And by the way this same police bill, ever since its inception, has cut an extraordinary figure in the political history of Nevada. It was the phoenix to rise out of the burning agitation of the big miners' strike in Goldfield something like a year ago. Senator Nixon, one of the principal owners of Goldfield Consolidated, and the coterie of powerful mining interests that surround him, was anxious to have President Roosevelt send Federal troops to the camp to overawe the strikers while the way was being cleared for the passage of the bill through the Legislature. Senator Newlands and Congressman Bartlett, both Democrats, threw all the weight of their political influence at Washington to help him in this emergency, and to have the troops sent to Goldfield. And now to repay this obligation, so the political wiseacres of the State say, Senator Nixon, a Republican, worked his hardest to throw Nevada into the Democratic column this year so that Senator Newlands and Congressman George A. Bartlett might be re-elected to Congress. The unusually large floating population that has been drawn into the new camps owing to the mining excitement gave wily politicians an excellent opportunity to swing a large and very influential "doubtful" vote. At any rate this is the story that came out of Nevada many weeks before the three electoral votes of that State found themselves in the Democratic column.

of fearlessness in all matters that concern the public weal, news of the un-American practices of labor unions is tabu in the offices of our smug and pharisaical dailies. It is the policy of daily journalism to coddle, never to offend organized labor. In consequence of the steadfast pursuit of this policy the news of Seli Simonson's trouble with the Musicians' Union of this city has not been given publicity. Until recently Seli Simonson was musical director of the Princess Theatre. He was engaged for the position in New York at a time when the managers of the theatre were unable to find a competent leader in this city. Some time after his arrival the charge was made against him that he had violated union rules in coming to a strange city to accept a position which could be filled by members of the local union. Simonson was surprised that artists should be expected to abide by any such rule, but he had to defend himself before the union. He was told by the managers of the theatre that when they engaged him it was because they were unable to get a competent man in San Francisco. He so reported to the union, and he was told that Paul Steindorff was out of a job. The Princess managers said they had made an offer to Steindorff, but as he was engaged at Idora Park he refused to come to San Francisco. Nevertheless as Steindorff lost his position in Oakland when Idora Park closed up, Simonson was found guilty of violating union rules and fined $100. He appealed to the national body and the sentence was confirmed. When Kolb and Dill came to the Princess with their own musical director Simonson went east to renew the fight through his own union. He has not paid the fine and he says that unless it be remitted he will leave the country. The managers of the Princess prefer Simonson to any local director, and I hear that if not permitted to have their orchestra conducted as they see fit they will cut it down to the union scale of ten men, which means that five union musicians will have to hunt elsewhere for a job.

Kent's Great Benefactor

I hope the story of William Kent's industrial operations across the bay in Marin county, which appeared in the Examiner of last Tuesday, is not true. From that story it appears that Mr. Kent's gift of Redwood Canyon to the Government, for which he has been acclaimed a great public benefactor, was not an expression of unadulterated generosity. According to the Examiner Mr. Kent had the land converted into a government park not only for the purpose of preventing its condemnation by the North Coast Water Company, which he has been fighting for years, but to enable him to acquire a monopoly of the water business in Sausalito and Mill Valley. To this view of the matter color is given by the circumstance that Mr. Kent recently filed on 5000 miners' inches of water, obtaining at the same time a site for water works below the park. Moreover, it appears that whatever motive animated Mr. Kent in the making of the gift, there can be no doubt that it will inure to his advantage, as he owns the only railroad running to Muir Woods and also the only hotel that can be built in the vicinity.

Perhaps An Afterthought

In the light of these revelations it is hard to resist the impression that another idol is in process of disintegration. But in this instance appearances may be misleading. Perhaps the water project was an afterthought with Mr. Kent. Perhaps, too, when he saw that Redwood Canyon was to be condemned it did not occur to him that it would profit him more by reason of his adjacent domain, his railroad and his hotel site, to have the virgin forest preserved. All land owners are not as smart as Adolph Sutro, who donated the site for the Affiliated Colleges to the State for the purpose of enhancing his big holdings in the vicinity. As one of Mr. Kent's most ardent belauders; as one who appreciates his noble gift, and whose perceptive faculties are exceptionally keen when exercised in distinguishing between the genuine and the unworthy candidate for public esteem, I am not disposed to embrace the conclusion that his munificence is in the slightest degree tainted with sordid selfishness.

The Presumption of Innocence

While it is by no means clear that Mr. Kent coveted the esteem of the dear people it is certain that he relished the burning of incense in his honor and glowed with satisfaction at the praises which his generosity inspired. Mr. Roosevelt, I recall, exhausted the vocabulary of eulogy in the certificates of merit which he awarded to Mr. Kent, not only for his generosity but for the spirit of self-denial which prompted him to perpetuate the name of Muir rather than the name of Kent. And Mr. Kent accepted the certificates gracefully and with never a hint of the design now imputed to him—of converting his justly celebrated gift into the germ of an octopus. Are we to believe that Mr. Kent is a dissembler? Not unless we are in the habit of presuming men to be guilty without giving them a trial. I will not give credence to the Examiner's story. My faith in reformers has always been weak, but I know there are some good reformers in the world. I have faith in Mr. Kent notwithstanding his social relations with Mr. Heney and his enthusiasm as a member of the League of Justice. There must be some one of the Spreckels' bunch unselfishly engaged in earning our gratitude.

Judge Lawlor's Lapsus Lingua

It is no longer the proper caper in Judge Lawlor's court (or in the court over which Judge Lawlor presides, to speak accurately), for lawyers to accuse each other of lying. The sensitive ear of the court revolts at this plain mode of speaking; and furthermore it is probable that the damnable iteration of the epithet by Lawyer Heney has at last jarred upon even the Lawlor nerve. As reported by an apparently honest chronicler Judge Lawlor put a quietus on Heney by inisisting that neither side of any controversy before him should pass the lie, because the word was usually uttered to "aggravate." It is almost impossible to accept the report of the newspaper in this record of what Judge Lawlor said on this occasion. Judge Lawlor is a past master in his use of the English language, and it is well night unbelievable that he would use the word "aggravate" in place of the word "irritate." He knows better than any other judge on the various benches of our courts that words, however harsh and truthful, do not "aggravate" the person at whom they are "hurled." Moreover, it must be well within his knowledge that Lawyer Heney cannot be "aggravated"; he has attained the limit; he is aggravation in the superlative degree; he is past all surgery; he cannot be aggravated or exaggerated. He can be irritated, however; and that is what is happening to him day by day and what has happened to him for about 750 days of strenuous but unavailing effort to put somebody, anybody in the penitentiary. Judge Lawlor must have said that Lawyer Heney must not be "irritated" by opposing counsel. Judge Lawlor is not prone to make such bad breaks in his "caustic verbiage." He knows better and knowing dares to speak his knowledge.

The Passion for Mouth Fillers

It is one of the jokes of the legal profession that Judge Lawlor, believing that all law worth knowing is to be found in the codes, apprehends much more law than he comprehends. But Judge Lawlor is not similarly deluded with respect to language. He knows that the dictionary doesn't contain all that is worth knowing about words. Archbishop Tench is an old acquaintance of his, and he has read his Whitney from kiver to kiver. And yet from the daily prints one might infer that Judge Lawlor had fallen into Jimmy Britt's habit of using what the poet Rogers calls "album words" and employing language more for the sound of it than for the sense of it. From the bench the other day Judge Lawlor, the reporters say, told Reuf's lawyers that they "should not impute to Mr. Heney motives calculated to disturb the serenity of the proceedings." I do not believe that Judge Lawlor said that; for Judge Lawlor would not impute to the attorneys the purpose of provoking a disturbance. He knows that "calculate" means to compute, to reckon, to project for any certain purpose, and that it is a big, wrongful pretender, as somebody has said, to the place of two much better words—"likely" and "apt." Judge Lawlor knows that clarity of language is essential to the "serenity" of juridical utterances, and he knows that my use of a certain word in this sentence is much better than his use of it in the foregoing quotation. He knows that to misuse words is to confuse ideas, and that much litigation has resulted from two men giving to one word different meanings. Judge Lawlor is not more zealous in purging away corruption of morals than he is in purging away corruption of language.

Another Clay-Footed Idol

My old friend the Rev. Tom B. Gregory, who, in ethics and archaeology is the peer of my old friends Garrett P. Serviss and Edgar Lucien Larkin, the astronomers and paleontologists, is preaching "sermons in stones" for the edification of the ignorant multitudes. Tom's latest "sermon" is on "the glorious Alhambra," the attempt to describe which, he says, "would be downright foolishness." And he repeats: "The Alhambra cannot be described"; whereupon, like Professor Larkin, he spreads his pinions and taking a swooping flight from Parnassus to Helicon: "As well attempt to describe the carnival of glory that takes place when the clouds of the western heavens are being played with by the vermilion and gold of the sunset." Quite true. The spectacle of a "carnival of glory" "taking place" when a vermilion-colored sunset plays with the clouds of the western heavens is indescribable; it must be seen to be appreciated. But attempts have been made to describe "the glorious Alhambra," notwithstanding its indescribability by describers of the Gregory class. Washington Irving's effort in this direction was one notable example of what may be accomplished when the pen is in the hands of writers entirely great. Dr. Gregory should have borne himself more humbly and in more modest demeanor. He should have said that "the glorious Alhambra" was beyond the powers of description by a Gregory. And he did not strengthen his dictum regarding the indescribableness of the Alhambra by comparing its super-Gregorian splendor with the indescribable "carnival of glory that takes place when the clouds of the western heavens are being played with by the vermilion and gold of the sunset." I doubt if Professor Larkin or Professor Serviss would have confessed their incapacity in the presence of "the glorious Alhambra." I believe that either of them would have tackled the job without a murmur. I am sure that Professor Larkin, who has wrestled with earthquakes and cataclysms and other indescribable convulsions of nature would have gone to it resolved to describe or perish in the attempt. Professor Larkin is no quitter when it comes to describing the indescribable or even that which "beggars description." And when we recall what Professor Serviss has accomplished in the way of vivid, accurate and thrilling descriptions of many things in the heavens above and in the waters under the earth, we are not only confident that he would not quail before anything in heaven or earth conceivable in merely human philosophy; and we are sure that for him "the glorious Alhambra" would be as a "carnival of glory" to a trained magazine writer, of a vermilion sunset in the descriptive grasp of a maker of best sellers. Go to, Dr. Gregory; I can no longer class you with the popular literati; you are no longer of the yellow illuminati; you are indescribable.

Robert Ku Tung and Chop Suey

Equality before the law is not always recognized by those who hold the scales of the law. There is the case of Robert Ku Tung Bosman, for example. The law inhibits foreign polygamists from landing in this country. Robert Ku Tung Bosman is in that category although he is married, Chinese fashion, to only two wives. Yet

Robert Ku Tung Bosman has not only been permitted to come ashore in this city, but he will be permitted to remain here six months provided he will send one of his wives back to China. This is beating the devil around the stump. The law lady with the scales lifts her bandage to wink with her all-seeing left hand eye. Robert Ku Tung Bosman is a polygamist under the law, but he is only half a polygamist if one of his two wives returns to the place from which she came. As a mere bigamist he slides through the immigration barrier an accepted monogamist if he brings with him but one of his wives; or if he will reship one of his wives to Hongkong—which is the same as if he had defied the law by landing or attempting to land with only one wife. The law, therefore, is one thing for Robert Ku Tung Bosman, and it is quite another thing for Chop Suey Wun-lung. Why? Because Robert Ku Tung Bosman is a rich half-caste of Hongkong and Chop Suey Wun-lung is a poor coolie of Canton. Because the wives of Robert Ku Tung Bosman are of no earthly use to him except in their wifely function; while the wives of Chop Suey Wun-lung are inured to toil hand-in-hand with their husband for the provender of a miserable existence. And finally because Robert Ku Tung Bosman, the millionaire half-caste of Hongkong, who would not be permitted to trespass upon the compound of any of the full-caste clubs of that city, has a long pull, a strong pull and a pull altogether at Washington; while the poor coolie, who would be employed to wash the club windows, has no pull at all. In Hongkong Robert Ku Tung Bosman the Eurasian keeps his place in the social scale and must submit to all laws, judicial and social, in his case made and provided; but in San Francisco Robert Ku Tung Bosman is above the law by the grace of higher-ups at the law-making capital of the nation; at the very source of justice, whence emanates the hypocritical pretense that under the aegis of the republic there are equal rights for all and special privileges for none.

It Is Not a Square Deal

Personally I have not the slightest objection to Robert Ku Tung Bosman. His dinners are better worth eating than any that are served in Hongkong; his curried prawns are a memory to linger longer than the onion soup of the German club or the ragout a la Duke of Connaught of the English club; his bird's-nest potage flavored with wild sassafras and oil of camphor would not offend the pampered palate of his imperial majesty, Kuang Su, son of Prince Chun, who was the seventh son of Tao Kuang and successor to his royal cousin, Emperor Tung Chi, who died without issue on January 12, 1875, from smallpox; and the wines that accompany the viands are direct from the choice tiers of the most famous cellars in France and Germany and Sonoma. To all of which Mr. Taft can testify in grateful remembrance. It is not to Robert Ku Tung Bosman personally that I object; nor to his lavish hospitality at his palatial bungalow on the Peak, bestowed on all wandering Americans properly credentialed; and as for his plurality of wives, it is none of my business. But when he is permitted to flaunt his polygamous or bigamous marital relations in the face of our laws while my friend Chop Suey Wun-lung is denied that privilege, I enter my earnest protest—not against the privilege granted to Robert Ku Tung Bosman, but against the discrimination that sends Chop Suey and his harem back to the flower boats of Canton.

An Imperial Minister Coming

Mr. Bosman brings news of another important Chinese personage who is now speeding across the Pacific to this country. Bearing the thanks of the Chinese government and their Imperial Majesties, his Excellency Tang Shao Yi, Governor of Mukden, is now on the heaving billow. Tang Shoa Yi is one of the most prominent and successful of China's executive officers. He is a Yale graduate, and is strongly pro-American in every way. It is interesting to note that he is at the same time strongly anti-British. Needless to say, Tang is much liked and admired by Americans in China. Tang is accompanied by his private secretary and three junior officials. China's object, of course, in sending so able and exalted an official is to show other Western countries that China feels deeply the generous action of the United States, particularly since money is so scarce at present throughout China and the people are so poor. Moreover, it is believed that Tang's mission goes farther, and is concerned with the development of industrial enterprise in the three eastern provinces of Manchuria. It is said to be the intention of the Peking government to invite American capitalists to invest money in mining and other industries in Fengtien, Kirin and Keilungkiang, and especially in Fengtien, the richest of the three.

Horace Platt's Speeches

"Lord Roseberry has said that people do not read old speeches, and there is much truth in the statement." I quote from the preface to a volume of old speeches, modestly and somewhat apologetically sent forth into the world by Horace G. Platt, renowned as an after-dinner speaker, and admired for his cultured oratory. This volume contains old speeches which I have found much delight in reading, and which, I am sure, will be read with delight by many others; not only because of their intrinsic merit, but because the pages of this book abound in the grateful aroma of other days and reflect something of the moods and phases of a generation that passed with the City That Was. A False Accusation

The friends of the graft prosecution are much disturbed because the Examiner is keeping tab on the days that are steadily elapsing since the prosecution undertook to put everybody they don't like into the penitentiary. One of these friends of the graft prosecution attempts to turn the tables on the Examiner by accusing that newspaper of exerting its influence to keep those whom the graft prosecution don't like out of the penitentiary. It is the Examiner influence, says this prosecution organ, that has balked the graft prosecution in its efforts to send persons whom the prosecution dislikes, to the penitentiary. While the accusation is in one way somewhat complimentary to the Examiner, it is at the same time decidedly uncomplimentary to the graft prosecution. It infers that the newspaper is more powerful than the combined influence of Rudolph Spreckels, James D. Phelan, Francis J. Heney, William J. Burns and their hirelings and satellites; more powerful than their own newspapers; and more powerful than all their preachers, reformers and political partisans. But of course this is not true. The Examiner is not the stumbling block in the way of the graft prosecution; it is the graft prosecution itself that bogs down in the mire of its own making. The graft prosecution stumbles over its own feet, which are as the feet of a centipede for number and as awkward as the hoofs of behemoth in the vain effort to avoid collision with one another. The graft prosecution is like a militia colonel just appointed by the Governor incessantly tangling his undisciplined legs with an unaccustomed sword of rank and authority.

Phonographic Italian

Miss Katherine Elkins is reported in the newspapers as making herself mistress of the Italian language aided by a phonograph. Miss Elkins' education in this particular was neglected earlier in her youth, in pre-ducal days, because French was deemed a more elegant accomplishment than the gift to speak the tongue of Tasso and Ariosto; so French spake Miss Elkins "full fair and fetisly after the school of Stratford-at-the-Bow," for, like the Prioress of sweet Geoffrey's pilgrimage, the "French of Paris was to her unknowe." In West Virginia the vassals that do liege homage to the house of Elkins speak a patois of ancient Westmoreland English akin to the speech of Washington, mellowed with the quaint burr of the old slave days; and upon this lingual base Miss Elkins will erect her verbal structure after the Tuscan order of architecture, assisted by a phonograph disked with records of the conversational method of the Italian court and choice sections of Italian opera.

Not in the Tongue of Dante

As Duchess of Abruzzi Miss Elkins will be required to speak court Italian, which is no more the Italian of Dante and Petrarch than West Virginia English is the English of Shakespeare and Jonson. It is a labor of love, of course, to the purpose that the fair student may bear herself seemly in the august presence of her husband's royal relatives; not necessary, to be sure, for every tongue that speaks but Abruzzi's name speaks heavenly eloquence, requiring no interpreter, nor a phonograph to teach the "proper tone and the correct inflection." Italian is not a difficult language, but like everything else worth while, its mastery involves expenditure of time and close attention, especially in the "conversation of the higher rank," as the correspondent at Elkins, West Virginia, classifies that vernacular. It is rather late for Miss Elkins to begin this study, but it is fortunate that she need only acquire the court vocabulary and the "proper tone" thereof. The Duchess-elect ought to be able to speak "with the same fluency as the other members of the royal family" (to quote the supposition of the newspaper correspondent at Elkins, West Virginia), after a brief course of six easy lessons on the phonograph, aided as she will be by the Italian opera records, the vocabulary of which exceeds that of the conversational method of the royal Italian court, by about 150 words. As the Divina Commedia and Jerusalem Delivered are not discussed at the levees of the Italian court, it will not be required of the Duchess d'Abruzzi that she shall "thoroughly familiarize herself with all the details of the Italian language," as the newspaper correspondent at Elkins, West Virginia, insists must be the result of her communion with the phonograph. It is rather unfortunate in this relation that the prudery of the Italian court bars Boccaccio and other masters of the politest literature in all belle lettres; else the American Duchess would gain much by her phonographic instruction wholly aside and beyond the somewhat meagre acquirement of enough Italian to make herself understood at the court of her near royal spouse.

Attacked By Leeches

The transport Sheridan brought news from Manila of the most hazardous and most important overland trip that has has been accomplished in the Philippines since the close of hostilities. It was made by First Lieutenant James S. Bradshaw, Fifth Field Artillery, and Second Lieutenant Harry L. King, First Cavalry, afoot from Camp Stotsenburg directly across the center of Luzon to Atimonan on the Pacific Coast. The start was made during the latter part of July with twelve cargadores, the purpose being to ascertain if it was possible for a party to get through and whether or not a trail or road existed. After several days out the cargadores became footsore and all but four deserted the party. It was impossible for the remaining cargadores to carry the rations, so from that time on the officers and their remaining cargadores were obliged to subsist on the roots of herbs, which they admit was enough to furnish them with sufficient nourishment and moisture to keep them alive, but not enough to keep a man in full muscular development. After about thirty days from the time they left Stotsenburg, the officers arrived at Dingalon Cove, some distance north of Infanta. "The leeches," said one of the officers, "were one of the worst foes we had to contend with on the trip. One-half the party had to remain awake at night to keep these blood suckers off the other half." The party left Infanta on the return trip in September, taking an entirely different trail back to Stotsenburg.

"They say the orator has a splendid delivery," said one of the waiting audience in the back row.

The Rise of Upton Sinclair

Upton Sinclair, who is now in California on a Socialistic lecturing tour, is one of the most visionary of the brotherhood. He is a unique character, even for a Socialist. At sixteen he began his own support, but according to his confession he idled away nine years in college, paying little attention to the forty different courses which he began, but putting in his time over promiscuous reading and practicing on his violin. He says he frequently spent nine hours a day with his music, yet apparently he developed no skill or talent. During this period he supported himself by writing lurid romances of the nickel order. At twenty he became inspired with the idea that he was commissioned to write the Great American Novel. He had the courage of his conviction, for he betook himself to the woods and cut himself off from the world. There he toiled, alternately freezing and starving, until his task was accomplished. So certain was he of success that with the sum of eight dollars, the limit of his possessions, he married without even having ascertained whether his work would be published. It was a serious predicament, especially as the knack of grinding out nickel novelettes had been neglected, but what is to be thought of one so lacking in commercial sense that, instead of accepting with thankfulness the suggestion of an inappreciative uncle that he accept a position offered him in a bank at $3,000 a year, for the sake of his wife and child, he preferred to live in a home-made shack in the woods and peg away at his literature? Readers will recall that hysterical outburst, "The Journal of Arthur Sterling," purporting to have been found in a New York garret, left there by that unhappy poet, who had committed suicide. In order to give the story a backing of truth a death notice of "Arthur Sterling" had been published in one of the daily papers. Though the book attracted some attention as a sensation, most of the critics pronounced it an impudent fraud, and as soon as the public discovered that the journal was not a genuine document they dropped it. Mr. Sinclair was likewise convinced that it was his mission to write a war trilogy, the first volume of which, "Manassas," had some small vogue. The other two are yet to be.

His Communistic Colony

"The Jungle," which appeared two years ago, was the result of seven weeks of investigation into the lives of the inhabitants of Packingtown. Mr. Sinclair says he had no interest whatever in the condition of the slaughter houses as such. He does not eat meat and did not care whether the methods were cleanly or otherwise, but he was deeply concerned with the bodies and souls of the workers. "I aimed at the public heart," he says, "and by accident I hit it in the stomach." A truer criticism was never made, for, while the whole country revolted at the disclosures of the abominable condition of the slaughter yards no reader cared the proverbial bean for the fate of the characters. The author reaped a rich harvest from the book. Then Sinclair, the impractical, put his earnings into a socialistic enterprise. He bought a building in New Jersey which had previously been used as a school, and there installed a colony of congenial souls who were to live on more or less of a communisitc plan. The enterprise hardly had a chance to demonstrate its virtues or its faults, for within six months it was burned to the ground. One life was lost and eight persons were badly injured. The institution had been unkindly criticized during its brief existence. There was also some cutting remarks because the residents of Helicon Hall exercised their natural rights in refusing to accept as inmates all who applied in the name of Socialism, but chose to exclude those not congenial to all. No effort has been made to re-establish it. The loss fell most heavily on the head of Mr. Sinclair and the profits of "The Jungle" disappeared. Hence his present hunt in search of material to make another sensational seller.

Rabid Motorist—"Because the constable's the only one that gets any fun out of machines in that locality. He used my car for three hours yesterday, and then let me go, saying he found I had been traveling within the law."

The Tag-Day Epidemic

An epidemic of tag-day is sweeping over the land. Cities and towns are in its throes and charities and churches are gathering the harvest of profits. It is the latest and most profitable scheme devised by practical workers to raise funds for those eleemosynary societies that have exhausted the church "fair" method of harvesting the wherewithal to support their work. The "red badge of courage" is fluttering in a score of cities this week and "have a tag" is the inviting question issued from thousands of pretty lips—with no change given. A gentle protest on the part of husbands, fathers and brothers is already following in its wake, and bids fair to shortly prove, "I'm it" to tag-day.

Our Jackies in Japan

Comforting news from Honolulu and Japan anent the behavior of the sailors of the Atlantic fleet at those points, was brought in by passengers on the big liner Manchuria, which docked at Pier 42 last Tuesday with one of the heaviest cargoes in the history of trans-Pacific trade. According to the reports of sojourners in the land of volcanoes and shintoism, the humble coal passer and "turret man" are outdoing even their officers in the matter of exemplary conduct, thus setting at rest the qualms of certain dear and delightful patriots who predicted there would be international complications when our sailor boys "hit" Japan. A year or so ago one of the usually diplomatic statesmen of the Chrysanthemum Isle described the personnel of our navy as "irresponsible, irrepressible riff-raff, who enter service because of the exigencies of chance and an empty stomach." He was promptly suppressed, of course, but not before the ubiquitous reporter had cabled some dynamic excerpts of his speech to America. The record of the jackies at Yokohama and Tokio, however, has compelled the gentleman to eat his words and seek solitude in the up-country districts. Next to hitting with a twelve-inch projectile a bit of rag hung three or four miles at sea, there is nothing that could endear these 15,000 American boys to their countrymen more than creditable behavior.

Guns for Revolutionists

A sufficient number of condemned guns were sold at the War Department recently to start a dozen Central American revolutions. The Department sold to the Carl Hirsch Iron and Rail Company of St. Louis 175,000 old Springfield forty-five calibre rifles at forty-four cents each; 13,600 Springfield cadet rifles at thirty-six cents each, and 14,000 Springfield carbines at sixty-one cents each. Several Gatling, Hotchkiss and mountain guns were purchased by Frank Bannerman of New York for $19,300, and 560,000 rounds of cartridges were sold for $6.70 per thousand. The proceeds of the sale were $94,147.

Tells the Secrets of Central America

In his bungalow across the bay Herman Whitaker is finishing a thrilling romance with the rubber plantations of Central America as the background. The Harpers saw some of the early chapters and snapped up the story for publication, so it must possess considerable merit. Author Whitaker ought to know his locale thoroughly, for several years ago he cut loose from civilization and made an adventurous trip all by himself into the farthest recesses of Central America with the sole purpose of unmasking its strange secrets. While boring his way into the heart of the country he worked on several plantations, the kind that are cut off from the world and where the owners depend upon "blackbirding" and bondage to recruit their overworked peons, virtually slaves, for once trapped there a laborer rarely leaves the place alive. The "boss" is king and rules with the lash and his ungoverned passions. Such surroundings, grouped with unique characters, seems only possible in lurid melodrama, but Whitaker saw the slaves, worked with them in their miserable surroundings and looked into their lives. Incidentally he will make some surprising revelations on the methods of exploiting these rubber plantations tucked far away in the tropical fastness of the Americas, where investors have scant opportunities to investigate them. Whitaker has led an extremely varied and interesting life in search of color for his stories. He is an Englishman and when a mere boy ran away to become a Tommy Atkins in the British army. Then he roamed Canada in quest of adventures, found a wife, and settled down to farming in Manitoba. One day the Indians raided their place, burned the house and barns and the Whitakers escaped to try their fortunes in less colorful localities. Some twelve years ago they came to California and finally pitched their bungalow in the Piedmont hills across the bay.

By R. E. Mulcahy

The New York stock market was decidedly strong during the past week. As usual the Harriman issues made new high records, Union Pacific Common selling up to 177, Southern Pacific to 111; to this price must be added the recent dividend paid. There was no particular news to cause the advance, except rumors of a distribution of assets to be made by Union Pacific and the retiring of Southern Pacific preferred and the probable advancing of its dividend to a seven per cent basis. The tonnage now being handled by the Harriman roads is very large and is not much under the high records of these properties. Recently Harriman has placed large orders for new equipment for passenger service to be distributed among his different lines. It is said he will soon place large orders for engines and freight cars. This means that many other lines will follow his example, as Harriman seems to be the barometer in this particular feature. The political atmosphere has now been cleared sufficiently to permit of many new commitments which will go a long way toward forgetting the late depression and will start the wheels of progress in motion. Up to the present time there have been no signs of advancing money rates; call money continues nominally at two per cent, with time loans quoted at four to five per cent. If these conditions continue throughout the present month there will be little to fear for the rest of the winter months. The distribution of dividends on January 1st will be very large; these funds will return immediately into commercial channels resulting in a period of cheap money for at least one year more. The demand for American farm products by European countries is daily growing, especially is this so of corn. It is estimated by those well in touch with the foreign situation that 500,000,000 bushels of American corn will be exported this crop year; also that the United Kingdom and Continent will require 200,000,000 bushels of American wheat, and a very great quantity of barley. Everything point to heavy imports of gold from abroad to America this year. All angles point to the greatest prosperity in the near future that this country has ever witnessed; these conditions will be reflected in our security markets. It will awaken foreigners to our opportunities and will result in a large amount of American securties finding a lodging across the Atlantic. The big railway systems will find but little difficulty in financing improvements and extensions; they will lose no time in completing their plans in order that they may not run into a depressed period with a lot of unfinished work. The Atchison Company are, it is said, planning a great deal of new work, having given conditional orders already. The country has outgrown its railroad facilities; more lines must be constructed, otherwise the traffic of this country will be so sadly congested there will be indefinite delay to shipments. Very little railway construction has been done during the past ten years; the country has grown, population has increased greater than official figures show; these conditions are at our door and must be met. It is well to let well enough alone and give to all a chance to prosper, which is now within the grasp of all branches of trade; a condition never before realized. Stock market values will probably advance for ten days or so, when a fair sized reaction should take place. On any reasonable decline good stocks and bonds should advance to very high prices. This condition will show itself before the new year.

A Rumored Engagement

Presidio and Pacific Heights society is in a flutter over the rumored engagement of a very beautiful girl living in that vicinity to a handsome and popular army officer. The young lady hardly moves in the elect society of that exclusive locality and she occasioned considerable lorgnetting and side remarks not long ago when she made her first dazzling appearance at one of the delightful Presidio dances. The rumored engagement is more than a prick at the patrician pride of the demoiselles in the set, for several of them as well as their mamas have had their eyes for some time past on this handsome officer.

May Contest the Will

With the death of Mrs. Campbell-Parker in Honolulu last week may come a renewal of Princess Abigail Kawananako's attempt to break the trust that bound the will of her father, James Campbell. This instrument provided that the estate should not be divided until the youngest daughter, Beatrice, who is now fourteen, should be of age. The will bequeathed a family allowance of fifty thousand dollars a year, and a separate allowance of ten thousand to each of the four girls, as well as a munificent allowance to the widow, who afterwards married Sam Parker. Princess Abigail Kowananako, Campbell's oldest daughter, who is noted for her extravagant social ideas, was not satisfied with the provision. She attempted a few years since to break the trust, but abandoned the attempt through fear of incurring her mother's displeasure. The last three years the Princess has depended entirely on her mother's generosity, as her income for two years is garnisheed by her creditors. The Princess, who is Prince David's widow, is a handsome woman with an attractive personality, and although her husband died but six months ago, several suitors, prominent in Honolulu club and social life, are lingering very near her domain.

Miss Perkins is the daughter of Senator George C. Perkins. Her wedding to Mr. Cleveland Baker will take place November 18th.

Mrs. Malaprop in Society

That Mesdames Malaprops have not entirely gone out of style according to stories circulating in the smart set. Not long ago one of our most prominent dowagers entered the studio of a local artist and when she espied a statue of Buddha on his mantel, exclaimed, "Oh what a funny man, sitting on an artichoke!" Not long after she employed a connoisseur to select some globes for her chandeliers. As she unpacked them, in astonishment and as she studied the contours engraved upon them, said resignedly, "Well, I suppose those animals are the latest in Paris."

In the Hands of "Twenty-five"

With the return of Mrs. Henry T. Scott from the East it is now definitely announced that there will be several changes of consequence in the management of the Colonial balls to be given at the St. Francis hotel this winter. The latest plan is to select a committee of twenty-five ladies to direct the destinies of those very select affairs. Mrs. Henry T. Scott and Mrs. William Mayo Newhall will head the list. Names are now being carefully weighed in the balance to complete the requisite number. Nearly all of the members, however, will belong to the Burlingame set. Each of the ladies chosen will have the privilege of nominating a certain number of guests she wishes invited. The social success of the dances will rest with these ladies, so their selection is a matter of very grave importance.

Caught With the Fish

The wife of a prominent clubman went to market recently and the fish man informed her that her husband had been in and ordered the fish. "Indeed," she replied, "what did he order?" Being told that he had selected a very choice fish, the man also added, "I packed it nicely and put it in a basket for him which he carried. As her husband had announced he had business calls out of town that day she did a deal of thinking. The outcome would never have come to hand probably if the suspected man had not in his hurry from the train left his neatly packed basket in the car, and his club friends told the joke on him and in this wise the name of a fair widow somehow leaked out.

Miss Vera de Sabla entertained several of her friends at a luncheon at the Fairmont last Wednesday. Miss de Sabla will leave shortly for the East, and for that reason she has been the motif of late of several delightful little social affairs.

Union of Two Prominent Families

From the point of view of exquisite floral decorations and handsome gowns the wedding of Miss Gertrude Hyde-Smith and Baldwin Wood last Monday in the home of the bride's mother was one of the prettiest of the season. It was marked by extreme simplicity; only about sixty of the relatives and very intimate friends of the birde and groom being present. The marriage service was read by Rev. Charles Ramm before an altar covered with cloth of gold, banked with foliage and surmounted with tall vases of gorgeous white chrysanthemums and golden candelabra. The bride wore a handsome empire gown of heavy white satin, trimmed with quantities of rare old lace. She was given away by her cousin, William Horn. Eleanor Welty and Florence Lent, daintily gowned, were the flower girls. Miss Helen Dean was maid of honor. Thomas Eastland acted as best man. An informal reception and buffet wedding supper followed the ceremony. Mr. and Mrs. Wood have gone on a short honeymoon trip through the south. On their return they will occupy the Hyde-Smith residence while Mrs. Hyde-Smith visits her younger daughter, Mrs. Harold Dillingham, in Honolulu.

Her Debut at Tuxedo

Miss Janetta Alexander, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Alexander, is one of the Tuxedo debutantes in New York this season. This week there will be a dance in her honor. The Alexanders will go to town this month but they will keep their Tuxedo villa open all the winter and will give house parties there, especially during the holidays. Possibly Miss Ethel Roosevelt will be a guest at one of the Tuxedo dances. Miss Alexander has been her guest recently at the White House in Washington. Miss Carol Harriman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Harriman, will also be a debutante this season at one of the Tuxedo balls.

Caught in the Orange Blossoms

The wedding of Miss Pansy Perkins, daughter of Senator George Perkins, and Cleveland Baker, formerly of Oakland, now the District Attorney of Nye County, Nevada, will take place on November 18th. Contrary to the expectations of their many friends it will be a small and quiet affair at the home of the bride's parents in Oakland.

The announcement of the engagement of Miss Ethel Amweg, daughter of Mrs. Frederick Amweg, to Walter A. Scott, came somewhat in the nature of a surprise to their many friends. The wedding will not take place till next April. Mr. Amweg is a well known consulting engineer and is also a prominent member of the Governor's staff. Mr. Scott has a very responsible position with Baker & Hamilton.

The Fearless Mrs. Kirkpatrick

From the Chronicle I learn that "an American hostess who has made her mark in French society is the wife of General Edward Kirkpatrick of California, formerly Miss Hammond." Aso, that "she dispenses delightful hospitality to the great world of Paris, as well as to her compatriots in her splendid residence, 25 Avenue de Bois de Boulogne." The journalists of Paris have been "writing up" Mrs. Kirkpatrick of late—telling of her old adobe mansion in California which was formerly the residence of the Spanish Governors, and of her fearlessness as a horsewoman when in California, where she "rides her beautiful Arabs astride on a Mexican saddle with the queer South American shovel stirrups." According to one journalist, "No one who sees her in her Paris drawing-room would suspect her of being a remarkably good shot." This story has created a deal of amusement among Mrs. Kirkpatrick's friends in Monterey, where she lives when she isn't in Paris. The photograph of Mrs. Kirkpatrick reproduced on this page was taken at Del Monte on the occasion of that lady's first and perhaps her only appearance on horseback. It shows that when aiming at a bull's-eye the lady holds her weapon in her left hand. As for the Arabian nag which she bestrides, it belongs, I am told, to a citizen of Monterey who permitted it to be used for the occasion.

A Social Queen for Thirty Years

With the demise of Mrs. William Astor there passed a woman who for more than thirty years was the leader and arbiter of the country's wealthiest social set. Time and again efforts were made by ambitious women, backed by social prestige and great riches, to wrest the title from her, but without avail. Mrs. Astor attained her unique position through her connection with one of the oldest and most influential families in the country. At the same time she had their immense financial support at her command, amounting to some $500,000,000. Her own private income in later years amounted to only $70,000 and this she spent freely in entertainment; when it was expended, she was allowed to draw freely on the estate to conduct her campaigns in a way commensurate with the family prestige. Her mansions were built expressly for entertainment on magnificent scale. On occasions there were as many as a thousands guests at her entertainments. In her later years she received them seated in a high-backed chair, beneath a portrait of herself, painted by Carolus Duran. Regally gowned and wearing the famous Astor jewels she presented a more striking picture than the beautiful painting behind her.

Her Visiting List Society's Blue Book

For thirty years she dominated the New York and Newport smart sets and virtually named the socially elect. When she first aspired to leadership she consulted the late Ward McAllister as to who should be admitted within the golden gate; between them they drew up a list of "400" names, a title that was to be emblematic of the socially elect for many years. Later as wealth and society expanded the gates were widened and as many as twelve hundred guests danced in her resplendent ball rooms. During her regime her visiting list served as the Blue Book of New York and Newport. She had almost absolute power to make or mar the high social aspirations of those who sought her patronage. Her ancestry dated back to 1636 when Jacob Janes Scherner, founder of her father's family, landed in Manhattan. As Caroline Schermerhorn, daughter of Abraham Schermerhorn, she married William Astor in September, 1853. Her husband took little interest in society. He died in Paris in 1802, leaving the bulk of his property, about $65,000,000, to his son, John Jacob Astor. This fortune has increased enormously since then. There were four daughters also who were richly provided for: Mrs. James J. Van Allen and Mrs. James Roosevelt, both now dead, and Mrs. Orme Wilson and Mrs. Coleman Drayton, who later became Mrs. Ogilvie Haig. It is said that if the family plans are consummated Mrs. John Jacob Astor will succeed to the social crown of her mother-in-law.

Over the Cups of the Keeney Tea

Miss Kathleen de Young's Persian lamb coat attracted a great deal of admiration at the Keeney tea. Mrs. Selby Hanna and Mrs. Rosa Plotner were among the most colorful animated pictures there. A tag tea note made Mrs. Chrystal Harriman the most beautiful matron of the receiving party. She was gowned in a rare creation of black and white chiffon. Among the smartest gowned girls were the Misses Mills. And by the way, owing to the illness of Mrs. W. H. Mills the family were not able to leave for their tour abroad this winter. The date of departure now depends on Mrs. Mills' health.

Californians Abroad

Mrs. Henry T. Scott and Mrs. Joseph B. Crockett intend to spend the latter part of the winter in Egypt. Before starting on their travels, however, Mrs. Scott will return to San Francisco. Mrs. Crockett, who is in Japan with Mrs. Samuel Knight, will arrange to join Mrs. Scott later.

Scherill Schell and Edward Montgomery have been occupying a beautiful flat together in New York. Mr. Schell now has an important position on Scribner's Magazine. Edward Montgomery left recently in company with one of the managing officials of the Union Pacific for a delightful tour abroad. After visiting the Mediterranean countries he will winter in Rome and continue the cultivation of his voice. Mr. Montgomery is a brother of Mrs. Charles Stewart.

Surprised Their Friends

Friends of Miss Lillian Owens and James F. McNulty, who attended the card party given in her honor last week, were delightfully surprised when their engagement was announced. Miss Owens is the only child of Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Owens. She made her debut three seasons ago. She is one of the most popular members of Mrs. Ynez Shorb Buck's dancing and skating clubs and is a favorite in the younger set on both sides of the bay. Mr. McNulty is a promising young attorney and is connected with the law department of the United Railroads. No date has been set for the wedding, but it will very likely occur before the end of the year.

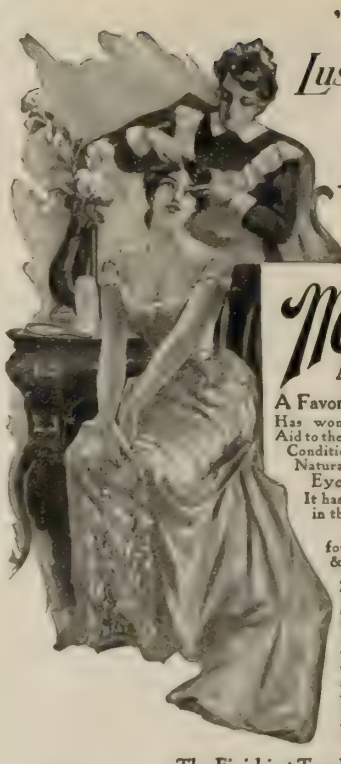
tain set of American women called forth such vigorous replies from Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish and Mrs. Tiffany, is coming to New York this winter. Considering the severity of her attacks on her fellow countrywomen, Mrs. Cornwallis West's decision has aroused great interest among her friends in London, who anticipate some interesting developments in those New York society circles whose women members are alleged to give such vulgar entertainments that blushes are brought to the cheeks of their compatriots.

The Cactus Aristocracy



A Los Angeles correspondent in speaking of the late attempt of twenty-five self-selected women to name 125 others who should pose as a "blue-blooded 150" says: "The new Cactus Aristocracy, of which I made mention some two or three weeks ago, seems to have come up against it; or, like Lot's wife, been turned into a huge saline cube, for not one of the self-selected twenty-five will say a word, except to mutely admit that the whole racket is off, in other words, that there were too many queer ones in the twenty-five to carry out the original plan of establishing the 150. As a matter of fact, the twenty-five did set themselves up—or intended to—as censors and dictators, but were sat down on, so to speak, and laughed at uproariously. Now, not one of them will utter a word and social movements have resumed their wonted atmosphere. Friends of some of the twenty-five declare that the whole thing was an invention of the Examiner, the object being to boost four or five members of the newly rich and an equal number of ambitious women who had graduated from bargain counter service and other avocations of either a clerical or domestic kind.

"Purple Aristocrats"

The agent of "America's Purple" is in town looking over the field and the field is full of candidates for admission. Never heard of "America's Purple?" Then you argue yourself ineligible. "America's Purple" aims to be an American Almanack de Gotha; a royal book of American citizens. It is an English enterprise and its purpose as stated in the prospectus is "to obtain for Americans traveling abroad the recognition to which they are entitled at home." If considered eligible you will be asked to enroll your name and the name of your wife and the name of your grandmother. Thus will you obtain a passport to social eminence. Not, of course, without putting up a little money to defray the cost of paper of a high quality and the purple ink. The agent informs me that a keen discretion must be exercised in the selection of names, and that he finds it a difficult task to differentiate the sheep from the goats in this city. He came hither with a few tips as to the people who are not all purple and the list is long. If it were exhibited in Burlingame it would cause much heartburning.

Some Royal Debutantes

One of the most interesting events of the forthcoming London season will be the debut of the elder daughter of the Princess Royal of the Duke of Fife. The debutante will then be just nineteen, and it has been decided that she shall join the court circle at the second May court, which is likely to be of exceptional brilliance. It was the king's desire that the Princess Alexandria should have come out this year, but the idea was abandoned at the request of the Princess Royal, who hopes by next year to be strong enough to be present in the royal circle when her daughter makes her formal appearance therein. The Princess shows much of her mother's shyness and

Bridge Players Surprised

A cry of despair comes from Vichy. Four visitors began a game of bridge in the Casino when the inspector of games stopped them. "But we are not playing for money," said one. "That's the very reason," said the inspector.

Inquiry at the Ministry of the Interior shows that the inspector was acting within his orders. The Government permit for gambling in the clubs at Vichy, Aix-les-Bains, Contrexeville and other watering places authorizes only baccarat, ecarte and the little horses. At Aix-les-Bains even the billiard table at the Casino has been removed. Presumably because the Government takes 15 per cent of all the money staked in the casinos of watering places it does not want to encourage any other form of gambling.

Bridge players have poured complaints into the Ministry of the Interior, and some scheme is under consideration whereby the interests of the State may be safeguarded and at the same time bridge players may still give themselves up to their favorite game. To deprive them of this pastime, the bridge players declare, is to compromise the benefits of their cure.

Keir Hardie Cornered by a Question

Keir Hardie, one of the three members of parliament who has been socially boycotted by King Edward VII, is an ardent socialist and it may be presumed, is proportionately grateful for the additional advertisement of both himself and his cause. It goes without saying that he is also an ardent advocate of "votes for women," and at the beginning of the recent obstreporous demands of the "suffragettes," he was to address a meeting which, as it happened, was attended chiefly by opponents of the movement. In "merrie England," as we all know, man does not sit mumchance while her better half makes a fool of herself, and the "booing" was so vociferous that the lecturer could not get a hearing at all. Finally the chairman managed to quiet the audience long enough to say: "Gentlemen, if you will listen to Mr. Hardie quietly, he will be happy to answer any question you may put to him at the end of his speech." When the honorable member of the House of Commons had resumed his seat, a question, written on half a sheet of note paper was sent up to Mr. Hardie and passed by him, unopened, to the chairman, who read it and grew very red in the face. "Read it out" roared a dozen voices, and the chairman was constrained to comply. It was "Why do they call you a Gibson girl?" and it effectively broke up the meeting.

Wonderful Subterranean Chamber

What is said to be the largest and most wonderful subterranean chamber in the world has just been opened up to visitors. It is situated in the Karst Mountains near Tieste and was discovered and first surveyed by G. A. Perko in 1890. This great cavern is reached from Opchina in Istria, first by a flight of steps hewn out of the mountain side, then by two almost perpendicular descents of thirty and seventy feet, and finally by half an hour's walk down a precipitous winding pathway which leads to an immense stalactite and stalagmite cave of great beauty with a domelike roof 460 feet in height, the cave being 440 feet wide and 800 feet long. The peculiar stalabmits formations here are considered to be among the most wonderful in the world; the path winds along through what seems an interminable forest of petrified trees.

The Alcazar's Dream Play

Of late there has been observed in the theatre a reaction of the imagination against the prose drama into which life comes with all its cruelty and nakedness. Illustration of this phenomenon is to be found in the Alcazar's current attraction, "The Road to Yesterday," which the authors, "B. M. Dick and E. G. Sutherland," who are said to be women, describe as "a comedy of fantasy," and which transports you from the tumult of familiar life into the midst of seventeenth century near-romance. This play presents a curious jumble of centuries, language and methods and a fine blend of the comic and melodramatic. It is an admirably fresh little play with no serious purpose lurking anywhere. It is a drama of fancy and apparently addresses itself entirely to the imaginative faculty, with just enough relation to life in it to keep you interested in the doings of the several characters. The play might properly be described as a midsummer night's dream, for that is what the authors introduce you to through the medium of an explanatory first act in which you meet several people who have vague impressions, notions and aspirations somewhat faintly correlated. There is a blend of the neurotic and the superstitious in this act and you wonder whether you are to be submerged in symbolism or tormented with psychological phenomena when down goes the curtain on the leading lady in a dream, and thereafter the acting out of this dream is what absorbs your attention. The idea of a dream drama is as old as Lyly's prologue to his Woman in the Moon, and the dream has been frequently employed as a piece of dramatic machinery, but seldom to such realistic ends as in "The Road to Yesterday." It is generally associated with fairy superstitions or fantastic riotings or dainty burlesques, but at the Alcazar the dream is merely the means to and end, the end being romantic melodrama. Tragedy and comedy jostle each other with such vividness in this dream that you almost forget that the heroine is to be roused from slumber in the last act. Indeed you are but vaguely sensible of the fact that the persons in the dream have no relation to life. They are compounded of as much flesh and blood as are to be found in the stage puppets of the average drama, and they act their parts with as much sincerity; so that there is no lack of illusions. As, according to the play, the lady of the dream dreams out a play, the result is that you get two plays in one. The idea is fantastical, but of pure fantasy, the kind for which the dream is usually employed in drama, there is none. There is poetry, however, in the conception and it appeals to the lighter emotions, for the whole is fragrant with hilarity and puts the mind in a state of healthful ecstasy. While the theme is treated with considerable felicity its execution is far from being as exquisite as its conception is delicate. The dialogue is without distinction, yet it serves well enough for the purpose of the play. As usual with the Alcazar players whenever they venture into new territory, the result of this production is the revelation of new qualities. Bertram Lytell as the swaggering seventeenth century yeoman exhibits the style of one who has been doing romantic roles all his life. And as for Evelyn Vaughan in this play she is a plaintive figure out of tapestry, a darling maiden out of a nursery tale. There is a good deal of artistry in Miss Vaughan's mimetic performance. She has a delicious simplicity of manner, and she is full of the warmth of charm. Her voice is sonorous, and she enunciates like one who loves the savor of words.

Another Week of the Clansman

"The Clansman," with its powerful story of the reconstruction period in the South, will remain the offering at the Van Ness Theatre for a second and last week, commencing with Sunday night's performance. The dramatization of Thomas Dixon, Jr., of his two famous novel's, "The Leopard's Spots" and "The Clansman" are all the press notices have described. The big scene of the drama is the hypnotic scene in the Ku Klux Klan cave when the negro is put through his confession. The company appearing in the play is fully up to all requirements. The result is a striking performance.

Sparkling Comedy at the Valencia

The last performances of Sedley Brown's stirring society drama, "A Navajo's Love," will take place at the Valencia Theatre, Saturday afternoon and evening, and on Sunday afternoon a laughing festival will be inaugurated when "Glittering Gloria" is presented. The action takes place in London and the first act shows the interior of a Bond Street jewelry store where a magnificent diamond necklace, valued at 5,000 pounds, is displayed for sale. This beautiful and costly ornament is frantically competed for by the numerous admirers of Gloria Grant, a comic opera singer. Two young married men, Jack James and Archie Toddleby, an American from El Paso, Colo., and several others try to buy the necklace and James succeeds. He is about to present it to Gloria when his wife appears on the scene. When asked for an explanation James asserts that he has purchased it as a speculation. He says that his old friend Milliken had told him at the club that he was going to purchase it for Gloria at any cost, so he had conceived the brilliant idea of buying it for 5,000 pounds and reselling it for 7,000. To satisfy herself Mrs. James insists on seeing Milliken. Her husband rushes out to Bond Street and brings in the first man he can find answering Milliken's description. This happens to be Zebedee Posket, a rural solicitor, also smitten with Gloria's charms. The wife insists on seeing the money change hands. A check for 7,000 pounds is passed, whereupon to James' great astonishment the solicitor demands the necklace and, upon obtaining it, leaves the store with Gloria. After some seemingly inextricable mixups everything is satisfactorily straightened out. Robert Warwick will have a splendid comedy chance as Jack James, and Miss Willette Kershaw, who will make her farewell appearance in this city, will revel in the role of Gloria. The rest of the cast will be in competent hands. Herman Heller and his unrivaled orchestra will offer, as usual, many high-class musical novelties and the usual critical competition for $100 in cash prizes will take place on Sunday afternoon.

The Forthcoming De Gogorza Concerts

Musical San Francisco will turn out at Christian Science Hall during the coming week to hear that magnificent baritone, Signor Emilio De Gogorza. At the first concert which will be given this Sunday afternoon, November 8th, at 2:30, the program will be as follows: Come raggio di Sol, Caldara; Where'er you walk, Handel; Aair de "Thoas" from the opera "Iphigenie en Tauride, Gluck; Mondnacht, Schumann; Ich Liebe Dich, Grieg; Feldeinsamkiet, Brams; Widmung Schumann—Emilio De Gogorza. Piano solo, Auf Flugeln des Gesanges, Mendelssohn-Liszt; grand polonaise, op. 22, Chopin—Mr. Henry C. Whittemore. Arioso from "Roi de Lahore, Massenet; Cantaras, Alvarez; En Galesa, Alvarez; Los ojos negros, Alvarez—Emilio De Gogorza. Piano solo (a) Nocturne, op. 37, No. 2, Chopin; (b) Etude de Concert, Forgnes—Mr. Henry C. Whittemore. Requiem, Sidney Homer; Mother O'Mine, H. Tours; Sing Me a Song, Sidney Homer; A Dream, Howard Brockway; The lark now leaves it's wat'ry Nest, Horation Parker—Emilio De Gogorza. At the Thursday evening concert numbers by Giordani, Monsigny, Nicolo will form the first group, the second being German works by Rubinstein, Hildach and Richard Strauss. French composers will be represented by Dubois, Paladhile and Widor and English by Goring Thomas and H. Lane Wilson. The operatic number will be the "Prologue" from "I Pagliacci" and there will be some Spanish numbers by Alvarez, including "La Partida." Seats may be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co's Next Friday afternoon, November 13th, at 3:30 De Gogorza will sing in Oakland at Ye Liberty playhouse, giving the opening program as above. Seats at the theatre box office next Monday.

A Collier Success at the Alcazar

"Caught in the Rain," which is announced as the Alcazar's magnet for next week, was preesnted here last season in the Van Ness Theatre with Willie Collier as the star, and it scored a great laughing success. It will bring out the full numerical strength and the best comedy talent of the Alcazar company, with Bertram Lytell in the part created by Collier and Evelyn Vaughan happily bestowed. The story goes that Dick Crawford (the hero) and Jim Maxwell are equal owners of the Siluria copper mine in Colorado, and that they have struck a fine vein of copper ore that is located directly under the ranch owned by Mr. Mason. Desirous of keeping all the stock to themselves they try to buy the ranch, but Mason refuses to sell, as it is encumbered and held in such a way that his daughter, Muriel, shall fall heir to it when she attains the age of twenty-one, and when the play opens she is only nineteen. Maxwell suggests that Crawford marry the girl, but Crawford, who is ludicrously afraid of the fairer sex, declines, because he had fallen in love with a strange young lady with whom fate, in the shape of a rainstorm, had placed him under a sidewalk awning in a Denver street. When the girl learns of the position her father is in she agrees to marry Crawford whom she has never met, to save her parent from ruin, but Crawford has gone East to forget things. In the last act he learns that Muriel is none other than his lady of the rainstorm, so he returns to Colorado and weds her and acquires the ranch and its underlying treasure.

Success of Kolb and Dill

Kolb and Dill continue to pack the Princess Theatre at every performance with their clever and amusing skit, "Playing the Ponies," which will enter on the third week of what promises to be a phenomenal run next Monday night. "Playing the Ponies" is undoubtedly the best vehicle these inimitable comedians have had for the display of their ability. As Pickus and Pluckus they convulse their audiences with laughter from the moment they first make their appearance on the stage until the fall of the final curtain. The production is most lavishly and beautifully staged and the cast is admirable. Special mention should be made of Billy Clifford and Maud Lambert, who ably second Kolb and Dill in promoting the enjoyment.

The Pasmores Abroad

The Pasmores are creating a sensation with their rendition of the Tschaikowsky A minor trio in interior towns, including Los Angeles, Claremont and Santa Rosa. At Claremont they played the Mozart in G, the Chaccone by Bach and the Tschaikowsky on Saturday and were engaged for a matinee on Tuesday and a third concert later in the week. Miss Mary Pasmore's playing of Bach's Chaccone was pronounced by violinists present better than that of other visiting artists, among them Maud Powell, Kubelich, etc. The Pasmores will repeat the Tschaikowsky trio by general request at their matinee on Sunday, November 13th, as well as at the concert proper on the 17th at Century Hall. This will give students and lovers of music an opportunity to hear this wonderful work twice and thus become acquainted with it, and come to a more complete understanding and enjoyment of its grandeur and beauty.

Capital Vaudeville at the Orpheum

The headliners at the Orpheum next week will be those celebrated wire artists, the Millman Trio, of which Miss Bird Millman is the dainty, clever and fascinating feature. Miss Bird Millman fairly won all hearts and in London, Paris and Berlin was absolutely idolized. The press ofthese cities were unanimous in eulogizing her for the wonderful manner in which she danced and pirouetted in midair. Henry Herton, late the successful star of "Eben Holden," and a remarkably clever character actor, will appear in a one act play entitled "Uncle Lem's Dilemma." He will be supported by Miss Louise Hardenburgh, a talented young actress. May and Flora Hengler, who for years have been delightful features of many of the eastern musical comedy hits, will entertain with gems from their repertoire. Mr. and Mrs. Allison, who style themselves "The Swede Girl and the Fellow Who Sings," will preesnt a comic sketch founded on "What Happened to Jones," in which they both scored heavily. Next week will be the last of "Slivers," the famous Barnum & Bailey clown in his excruciatingly funny baseball skit, also of the the Four Nightons, in their wonderful exhibition of strength. Alfred Kelcey will also conclude his engagement with this program and will be seen in a new one act comedy, entitled "Uncle Phineas." George Primrose will say farewell in his latest novelty, "Dancers of the Past and Present." A new series of Orpheum motion pictures will terminate the performance.

A SCENE FROM "THE CLANSMAN"
At the Van Ness Theatre

Has Taken Miss Illington's Place

From my New York correspondent I learn that Miss Helene Wilson, a California girl, has taken Margaret Illington's place in the play "The Thief." For several weeks past Miss Illington has given evidence that she was suffering from extreme nervousness and that a break down was imminent. Miss Muriel Hope relieved her for several performances, but the short rest proved ineffectual and her doctors ordered her to lay aside the role for several months at least. Miss Illington has gone into a quiet country retreat, where she will be insured complete rest.

Another Big Hit at the American

When "The Land of Nod" opens it's week's engagement at the American Theatre next Sunday matinee, theatregoers of San Francisco will have another opportunity of witnessing an entertainment which has not been excelled in the history of local amusements. This fine presentation of extravaganza was seen here last season, and it is not exaggeration to say that it proved to be of the highest order of excellence. It comes at this time with practically the same company which appeared before, including those rare favorites, Miss Adelaide Harland and Mr. Knox Wilson. All of the superb scenery and costumes which characterized last season's production have been renewed and all the song hits have been retained. Many new musical features have been added, and several fresh comedy scenes have been interpolated which will give the presentation all of the characteristics of a brand new show. "April Fool," "The Chorus Girl," "The Man in the Moon," "The Welsh Rarebit," "Bonnie," "The Sandman," "The Weather Man," are personages who will not soon be forgotten. Knox Wilson still heads the cast and will be seen in his original role of "April Fool." Miss Grace Drew, who made such a hit last season as "The Jack of Hearts," will be seen again in that role.

Delightful Sunday Musicales

The Sunday evening musicales which Donald Maclean and Henri Etlin are giving at their studio in Green street are proving a strong factor in the musical life of the city. The two young artists present new and interesting programmes each week. Mr. Etlin's playing is both a delight and a revelation, while too much praise cannot be given to the admirable and artistic singing of Mr. Maclean. The programme of the last musicale was as follows: For the piano it consisted entirely of etudes classical and modern, affording great opportunity for contrast and comparison. Etude, Chopin, Mr. Etlin; Am Kahne, Grieg, An Rose, Curschmann; Legend of the Sage (Jongleur de Notre Dame), Massenet, Mr. Maclean. Etude, Dubois; etude in thirds, Moskowsky; valse, etude, Saint Saens, Mr. Etlin. Gebet Verborgenheit, Wolf, Mr. Maclean. Etude, Poldini; etude, Mendelssohn; etude (Campanella) Liszt, Mr. Etlin. Les Ailes, Diemer; Hai Suli, Coquard; Pastorale, Bizet.

Arthur Cunningham, for years San Francisco's favorite singer, will begin his starring season at the Valencia Theatre Sunday afternoon, November 15th, in a big revival of Joseph Murphy's ever green success, "Kerry Gow," which will be staged under the personal direction of Mr. Murphy.

Horace Platt's Addresses

The preface with which Mr. Horace G. Platt has introduced his "'John Marshall and Other Addresses" is almost apologetic, but there is no need for him to have assumed that attitude. It is true, as he quotes from Lord Roseberry, that people do not read old addresses, or rather, that people generally do not seek out old addresses to read, but as in other things there is choice and it makes wide margin of difference who delivered the speeches and on what occasions. There is enough of wit, meat of information and general interest in the contents of this volume to save it from the common fate even if the members of the various organizations before whom the addresses were delivered were to prove forgetful or ungrateful. Mr. Platt disclaims any reaching out for fame, but says his only object in preparing to publish a volume before the disaster of 1906 was to give his fugitive efforts a local habitation. His sole hope now is that in case of another catastrophe at least one copy may survive. It is a modest wish that should surely see fulfillment. Many of the addresses were delivered on special occasions before the Bohemian Club. Others have been heard at the laying of corner stones, at college commencements and on other seasonable occasions. Published by the Argonaut Company.

Interesting Book for Boys

"The Boy Forty-Niners" is a self explanatory title. For the benefit of the youthful generation it depicts the adventures of a party of overland emigrants who began the long, eventful journey from Independence in that memorable year. As befits a juvenile, there are children in the party, two partly grown lads and a little girl. The two boys, both poorhouse waifs in Ohio, had been hired out, as was customary in those times, to a hard-fisted farmer who worked them early and late, paid them the smallest pittance he could bring himself to part with and stinted them in everything else. Ray Norman, the elder lad, knew that he was the orphan son of a circus performer who had been killed in one of his daring feats. Arthur Walton had been abandoned at the poorhouse without any mark of identification. While Ray had in his possession a ring of some value, once his father's, Arthur had nothing at all. The two boys had been chums in the institution and had refused to be separated when they were of an age to be hired out. So it was not surprising that when the gold fever began to rage both were infected and decided to leave surreptitiously together and make their way to the mystical California, where gold lay unclaimed in the public roads. No sooner had they started on their journey than they began to make friends and enemies and adventures crowded thick upon them. No boy is going to thank the best intentioned for anticipating his story, so it will be sufficient to say that Arthur and Ray missed nothing, from a steamboat race on the Mississippi, an explosion from which they escaped without damage, a meeting with a friendly Indian who made them his blood brothers, and the invitation to join one of the best parties outfitted for the journey, through all the pleasures and hardships of the long trip, buffalo hunts, Indian attacks, desert starvation and all, and that the last page leaves them in California, within a few hours' journey of the mines, though a series of unavoidable disasters had stripped the party of everything but their three horses and what they could carry in their hands. Ray Norman, however, has more, for quite by accident it has turned out that one of the men to whom he had felt drawn from the first, is his own uncle. This is only the first of the series, and those attentive readers who do not skip pages in their haste to see what is coming next will find themselves in possession of a valuable hint as to future developments. The map of the California and Oregon trail which forms the end papers is a decided advantage for the young readers. If one could find no other merit in "The Boy Forty-Niners" it would deserve commendation as a change from the everlasting laudation of school "pranks" and athletics. As a matter of fact it is written with more attention than is the average juvenile and is brimful of information. It should form a welcome addition to the private libraries of Pacific Coast children who, whether they are fortunate enough to have forty-niner grand and great grandparents to tell them tales at first hand, are at least brought up to the traditions of the period. McClure Co., publishers.

For Holiday Remembrance

"Quatrains of Christ" consists of a hundred and twenty-one stanzas modelled on the form and meter of the Rubaiyat, and as Mr. Julian Hawthorne informs us in the preface, designed to "attack the enemy on his own ground and fight him with his own weapons." This may be interpreted as the determination of Mr. George Creel to meet Omar's quatrains with companion outpourings but of directly the opposite philosophy, and to reinstate Christ not only in the hearts of the people but on their drawing room tables as well. As to that, there can be no cavil whatever, more especially as the author has avoided the usual platitudinous cant and his verses compare favorably with the best religious poetry. Yet, after many readings and much pondering, it is difficult to see why poor Omar should be held up to scorn for daws to peck at. Saving that the Persian poet, dead a thousand years, probably never came under the rod of the foreign missionary and knew not the Christian Bible, there does not seem to be such a wide difference between the teachings of the Rubaiyat and those of Bryant's "Thanatopsis." To accept the inevitable with a calm spirit, and to make use of the good things of the world while we are here, vexing not the spirit with vain efforts to solve the riddle of the universe, seems to be as much in the spirit of one as in that of the other. As usual, the Paul Elder Company has done its best to present an artistic and typographical beautiful and appropriate setting.

Cabman—Then madame left monsieur at about six o'clock as night was falling and kissed him goodbye.

Paul—Oh, this is too much!

Cabman—Oh, there's nothing wrong in that. You were within your rights.

Claire—There, you see how careful we should be?

Cabman—And then madame said to monsieur—that's how I knew you were his wife all right—"Be home soon so as not to keep dinner waiting." Monsieur had himself driven here then, to No. 135 Boulevard Haussmann, and he gave me a fine tip.

Claire—Oh, it was worth it.

Cabman—Monsieur came into the house. Of course I felt very kindly toward him. Then I got down to light my lanterns. There was a little breeze blowing from the Etoile, so I opened the door of my cab to shield the match, and then I saw that ruby earring on the floor, shining like a cigar. It couldn't belong to anybody else, for I had just come out of the stable when I picked you up and I hadn't had any other fares, so I says to myself: "Old man,' you're hungry; get your dinner first and then afterward, for dessert, while the horse is eating his oats, you can take it back to them this evening."

Paul—Are you through?

Claire—You're an honest man. (To her husband) Isn't he, Paul?

Paul—Yes, yes.

Claire (to her husband)—Give him two hundred francs.

Cabman (dazed)—Two hundred francs!

Paul—Oh, come now, you know, Claire——

Claire—Give—him—two—hundred—francs! What, don't you think that is enough?

Paul—Oh, yes, yes. Here they are. (He takes two notes from his pocketbook and hands them to the Cabman. His hand is trembling.)

Cabman—Oh, thank you sir. Thank you, madame. Two hundred francs! My goodness, I knew it was a handsome earring—but this is fine! Well, I'll be glad to serve you again, sir. I'm always prowling around the quarter. No. 6777—will you remember it?

Paul—Oh, yes. We'll remem——

Cabman goes out smiling and grateful.

Claire—(quietly, but with fire in her eye, to her husband, while she holds up the ruby)—Well, well, well! What have you to say to this little affair?

Paul—I? Why, I——

Claire—Yes, you, you! I hardly think you are going to deny it? Are you caught? Are you fairly caught? Right in the act? Is it a case of flagrante delictu? Yes or no.

Paul—I'd rather not answer you. It is more dignified. You're in a fine humor tonight. Let us drop it, won't you? It is a mystery, that will be cleared up some day, have no fear, and then we shall know all about it. Just the same, you've hurt my feelings. For no reason at all, for less than nothing, on the maunderings of a drunken man——

Claire—The cabman?

Paul—Oh, he is dead runk. I could smell the wine on his breath from my chair. That's why I didn't say anything, why I seemed to accept everything and paid up without a word. I had the patience of an angel. Oh, I had to have it. With the state that alcoholic brute was in, I knew that a single word of contradiction from me, an imprudent gesture, and he'd fly off the handle—he was capable of the most terrific violence.

Claire—Then you didn't take his cab?

Paul—I—I do not remember.

Claire—Oh!

Paul—And, anyway, what if I did take it? Couldn't I have taken it alone? Couldn't that man have been mistaken?—with possibly some idea of blackmail? (Striking himself on the chest) Hasn't a man thirty-five years old——

Claire—Thirty-two.

Paul—Haven't I the right to take a hack, without all this hullaballoo being made about it? That idiot finds a ruby in his wagon, in which two thousand people ride every day, and at once it is proved that I have a whole gang of mistresses.

Claire—One is enough for me. To which of the "people" does this ruby belong?

Paul—You are crazy!

Claire—You don't want to tell me? Very well, I shall find out.

Paul—Claire! (The bell of the street door rings.) Did you hear that?

Claire—Yes, someone has rung the bell.

Paul—Who in the world can it be at this hour? I hope you won't want to see them.

Servant (entering)—It is M. Brignon.

Paul—Oh, the fool!

Servant—As you are always at home to him, I thought——

Paul—Is he outside?

Servant—In the waiting room.

Paul—Show him in.

The Servant goes out.

Paul (quickly to Claire)—Nothing of all this before him, I implore you! At least let the world have no suspicion of the sorrow you are causing me.

Claire—Have no fear. Poor friend, he is uneasy because he hasn't seen you in the last few days. We didn't send Jeanne our good wishes on her birthday, so he comes to ask about us.

The Servant shows in M. Brignon.

Brignon (very much out of breath and excited)—Am I disturbing you?

Paul—On the contrary, my dear fellow.

Claire—How is Jeanne?

Brignon—In a minutes. First, tell me at once, you haven't found a ruby, have you?

Claire—Oh!

Paul—No.

Claire—Yes—I—that is, we——

Brignon—You have it?

Claire—Here it is. (She displays it.)

Brignon—That's it, that's Jeanne's ruby! Oh, what luck!

Claire (to her husband)—What did I tell you?

Brignon—You found it on your steps, didn't you?

Claire—On our steps. I was coming in, and I saw something shine——

Brignon—That's a miracle, it really is! She told me she had come to see you, after having gone through all the big stores. She rang the bell three times, but nobody came to the door.

Claire—Yes, we were both out, both of us. Why don't you speak, Paul?

Brignon—She must have lost it as she went down the stairs.

Claire—Or as she came up.

Paul (to Brignon)—But I don't remember that jewel!

Brignon—Naturally—she has had it only since day before yesterday. You see, I gave it to her on her birthday.

Claire—You do things handsomely.

Brignon—She's such a good little woman, and she loves me so much. So you can imagine her feelings when she discovered just now—she wept, she wanted to go to the police office—all sorts of foolishness. I soothed her as best I could, sent her to bed because she was utterly worn out with her shopping in those accursed stores—and once she was safely in bed, I picked up my hat without saying a word to her and rushed over here to you. I had just a glimmer of hope——

Claire—What a lucky idea it was!

Brignon—Yes, and here it is! I am sure you will excuse me, my dear friends, but I must leave you, for I am in a great hurry to take it back to her. Oh, but won't she be surprised and delighted when she knows that I came around here and that it was you who——

Claire—Yes, I sincerely believe she will.

Brignon (to Claire)—I'll give her a kiss for you (getting up and glancing at Paul)—for both of you.

Paul (choking with uneasiness)—That goes without saying.

Brignon (to Claire)—Have you any special message you wish me to give her?

Claire—Yes, tell her that I shall not fail to go and talk it over with her tomorrow, but that another time she should be more careful, because if an accident like that were to happen while she is in a public cab——

Brignon—Good-bye, my friends, I shall see you soon again.

He goes out.

Claire (looking at the door as it closes after him)—Poor, poor man!

Without even looking at Paul she goes to the door of her bedroom, which she opens and closes behind her, double locking it.

Paul (alone, limp as a rag)—Well, by gad!

Auto Notes

San Francisco is second only to New York in the number of 1909 cars received to date, is the announcement of the Chalmers-Detroit factory to E. D. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Company, local agents for the Chalmers-Detroit cars. In answer to a telegram from the local dealers in reference to rushing through cars, the Chalmers factory sent the following telegram: "San Francicso next to New York. Have shipped one hundred and sixty-seven 1909 models to New York, and shipped to San Francisco to date one hundred and fifty-four. Will rush further shipments to fifteen cars a week to assist you in making deliveries."

W. S. O'Brien, who has been a resident of Panama for fourteen years, has taken delivery of a Model K White steam runabout. Mr. O'Brien has had enough of life in the tropics and has purchased a ranch near Glen Ellen. He expects to make frequent trips between this city and his ranch in his big White.

W. H. Morrison and family returned to their home at Suisun, Solano county, this week from a fishing expedition to Shasta county. They drove from Suisun to Anderson in their forty horsepower Buick touring car.

The brilliant performances of Gus Seyfried at the wheel of the White steam car in the middle west races has delighted the plucky young driver's friends in this city, where he resided before he went into the racing game.

Word has been received here by the Pioneer Automobile Company to the eeffct that the 1909 Chalmers-Detroit Limousine Chassis will consist of the regular chassis now used on the "30" touring car with the exception of extra springs for the limousine body, four-inch tires, special mud guards and rear aluminum steps.

H. O. Cummings, a mining operator of Shasta county, returned to his home at Redding Sunday in the Buick "White Streak" which he purchased from the Howard Automobile Company last week.

Captain H. D. Ryus, who drove the winning White steam car in the Mt. Baldy road race, has returned from a visit to the White factory. In an interview regarding trade conditions he said: "The automobile business in the East has a promising outlook. At the White factory everything is moving rapidly. They are employing 1200 men and working three nights a week, and in thirty days this number will be increased to 1600 employes. The new White steam car is going to be a wonder. I am more than pleased with it and words fail to properly describe it."

Another evidence of the speed of the Chalmers-Detorit cars is shown by the following telegram received yesterday by E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Company: "Won special ten mile match race with Chalmers forty speedster. Best race of day, defeating Packard and Welch. Karl Schnorr, driver." This was a special three-cornered match race. Each owner thought his car was the fastest.

Mr. H. H. McClintock, superintendent of the Southern Division of the Standard Oil Company, has written a very interesting letter to the Diamond Rubber Company of this city, stating that on his last set of Diamond tires he had covered 14,600 miles, having during all that time but two punctures and finishing this record with the original air in two of the tires. He further states that he covers the worst roads in the State of California, being broken shale, sage brush, mountain passes, sand and dirt oiled roads, so that the record is one of particular interest to users of tires.

Sacramento is rapidly becoming an automobile center of importance in this State. So great has become the demand for motor cars in the capital city that the Phillips Drayage and Warehouse Company has just celebrated the arrival of the first wholesale shipment of Chalmers-Detroit cars direct from the factory. That the interior of the State is going to prove a great automobile market is proven by the fact that all of the agents in the country are clamoring for larger shipments from the Pioneer Automobile Company, local distributors of the Chalmers-Detroit cars. This is the first time on record for a shipment of motor cars to reach Sacramento direct from the factory. S. M. Phillips, Sacramento representative of the Chalmers-Detroit cars, reports all of the first shipment of cars sold.

Charles S. Howard of the Howard Automobile Company, has gone to Los Angeles to secure a location for the distributing agency for Buick automobiles, which he will open there early in November. The Howard Automobile Company recently secured the State agency for the Buick line, having heretofore held only the Northern California agency rights.

One of the most important features of the modern motor cars is the double set of ignition with which the majority of high-powered machines are equipped, which adds to the equipment of the car but aids materially in the steady running of the motor. In discussing the use of the double ignition system, E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Company said: "There are many advantages to the use of the two systems of ignition on a motor car, in the magneto and spark generator. All expensive cars are equipped with them, machines priced at $4,000 and over. The spark generator permits easy starting without cranking the machine. The magneto saves money and repairs. No other car with the same weight (2,000 pounds only), the same merit, built with the same good material, sells for the same price as the '09 Thomas Flyer 6-40. Three thousand dollars is a very low cost for such a machine. That's why it has taken like wildfire. That's why the factory is working a day and night force while other makers are laying off."

At last a player piano operating the Entire Key Board without fatigue to the performer

Heretofore Player Pianos have either been limited to the use of only sixty-five out of the eighty-eight notes of the piano, or, if they played the entire range of the piano keyboard, were such a tax upon the muscles of the legs and ankles that the fatigue of operating them was greater than the pleasure they afforded.

Every one knows that the really beautiful pieces of music require the entire keyboard of the piano for their proper execution and that in rewriting them to fit the sixty-five note player much of the brilliancy of the original music had to be eliminated.

The objectionable fact that Player Pianos only operated sixty-five out of the eighty-eight notes was overcome some time ago by the introduction of eighty-eight note players, but it was only with the perfection of the eighty-eight note Farrand-Cecilian that both EASE IN OPERATION and the playing of the entire keyboard were combined.

These instruments are now being demonstrated upon the seventh floor of our building, Kearny and Sutter sts., at our store at 1635 Van Ness ave., and also in our Oakland store, and are well worth seeing. They signify a radical improvement in Player Pianos and should be thoroughly investigated before any other Player is purchased.

Ultimately all Player Pianos will play the eighty-eight notes, but all will never be easy to operate, and any instrument that completely tires the operator is far from being a source of real enjoyment.

These eighty-eight note Farrand-Cecilians can be played either by hand like an ordinary piano or mechanically as a Player Piano. All the standard sixty-five note rolls can be played upon them as well as the new eighty-eight note rolls so that no music need be destroyed.

The most remarkable feature of this new instrument, aside from the fact that it plays the entire keyboard, is that its Player mechanism is composed entirely of metal, which is by long odds the most vital mechanical improvement ever made in Piano Player construction

Steel, brass and bronze are used for all air chambers, valves and connections, instead of wood as heretofore, thus doing away with the difficulties of contraction or expansion occasioned by climatic changes, heat or dampness, which have always caused so much trouble in the wooden action found in all Piano Players.

It is really an instrument of eminent importance and will prove to be of great interest to all those people who are impressed with the fact that they want a Player Piano, but who wish to be assured that they are getting the very best that money can buy.

We have one in our Kearny st. window which you might examine while you are passing. It makes an interesting display.

Our New Contributor

When President Roosevelt ceases from active participation in the presidency he will be "continued in our next" as the most valued contributor to the Outlook magazine, a publication that has not, heretofore, exercised a dominating or especially perceptible pervasive influence on public opinion. The precise terms of the contract are not known; it is rumored that the price to be paid for Citizen Roosevelt's precious stuff will not be less than a dollar a line; but in truth the exact relation between the ex-President and the business manager and cashier of the magazine is in the nature of a State secret. Citizen Roosevelt will be permitted to choose his own subjects, and it may be safely surmised that the range will be broad and deep—anything and everything from the dawn of creation to the night of another chaos. It may also be surmised that when Citizen Roosevelt is paid for his contributions to the magazine the business manager and cashier will have to dig down into their own jeans to meet the deficit between Citizen Roosevelt's rake-off and the other cost of publishing his stuff. The real reward and the substantial profit to the Outlook will come after Citizen Roosevelt has been erased from the payroll. This reward and substantial profit will accrue from the increased circulation and advertising patronage conseqent upon the prestige conferred upon the publication by its distinguished contributor.

Rival Journalists

It has been argued that if Citizen Bryan, a quadrennially unsuccessful candidate for the presidency, can reap a rich harvest of dollars from his Commoner, the Outlook ought to prosper in a far greater degree as the medium of expression of a real President whose success has been the eighth wonder of the world. Furthermore, it is argued that the Commoner is merely a sort of class publication, dependent for its inspiration upon an editor whose views are narrowed to the selfish demands of a proletariate constituency; while the Outlook, as its name implies, comprehends within the scope of its editorial vision all that goes to the making and operation of the entire universe. The appeal of the Outlook is to all classes and to the masses; the Commoner is merely an organ of the dissatisfied. The trouble with the Outlook heretofore has been the vastness of its outlook; the success of the Commoner has been due to the concentration of its purpose upon the needs of about a million discontented persons who preferred the pessimism of the Commoner to the optimism of the Outlook. Hereafter everybody will read the Outlook, and as everybody cannot afford to read the Outlook and the Commoner, it is believed that the circulation receipts of the Commoner will decrease materially. Citizen Bryan will probably realize shortly that misfortunes do not come singly.

With Pen and Voice

The prospect is very bright. The gayety of the nation is to be promoted verbally and orally. Citizen Roosevelt will not only amuse the populace through pages of a magazine, but he will probably provoke hilarious comment by his utterances in the United States Senate. Already it has been suggested that he should succeed Senator Platt as the senatorial representative of New York. Thus we are to be twice blessed; by what Citizen Roosevelt writes and by what Senator Roosevelt says. We shall, in all probability, not hear the last of Roosevelt until the dust of this generation shall return to the earth as it was, and the spirit of immediate posterity shall return unto the God who gave it. Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher; all is vanity.

The Simple Spellers

From the headquarters of the little group of tailors of Tooley Street who are simplifying spelling for us there emanated the other day another list of words which have been altered for general use in accordance with a uniform rule. With the exception of the editors of one or two magazines that purport to be purveyors of literature nobody appears to be taking these word-menders seriously, but they insist that they are making good headway. This, however, is not the first time that the language was threatened with a revolution. There have been many movements similar to the one to which those literary giants, Andrew Carnegie and Theodore Roosevelt, have paid the tribute of their endorsement. As early as the first half of the last century there were simplified spelling propagandists who exulted over the great headway they were making. They went so far as to publish a paper called "The Fonetic Nuse" which attained a circulation of almost 1,000. But in time the movement came to a halt. Since then no simplified spelling movement has caused any excitement in either England or this country. Nor is it likely that any such movement will ever cause much of a stir in the world. Simplicity in spelling is not such a great desideratum as men of little knowledge imagine. It cannot be gained without losing more than the gain is worth. Its tendency is to obliterate the traces of the historical formation of the language, and without a knowledge of the history of words writers cannot use them with precision or avail themselves of the subtle shades of meaning. Another objection to uniformity of spelling is that it increases the already too great similarity of words; syllables that are identical to the ear, by a uniform system of spelling will be made alike to the eye; as, for example, "rite," "right" and "write." The greater the difference between the ideas and the symbols of ideas the better the language. Simplified spelling means a vague medium of expression.

Our Moral Spasm

There is nothing easier than the fabrication of gratifying omens out of current phenomena, which is one of the favorite pastimes of our great publicists and journalists. Immediately after every election they tell us exactly what the result means; why the people voted one way and why they voted the other. Since Tuesday of last week these intellectual dapperlings and psychological scientists have been very busy pointing out the unmistakable significance of the vote in several sections of the country. Nothing perplexes them; the deepest tendencies they can fathom; the signs of the times are to them an open book. They see much that is grateful to them in the moral spasm that has seized the people. The objection to a moral spasm is that it is ephemeral. It is nothing more than a movement which, as Spencer tells us, is always rhythmical; after going to one extreme, a reaction carries it to the other and then comes eventually a re-reaction. All peoples have moral spasms, but nowadays these spasms are seldom induced by love of country in any generous or noble sense; in any other than the sense of self-interest. An expression of the spirit that moves large bodies of men as well as individuals in this country was given by the people of Los Angeles when they voted against issuing bonds for the improvement of San Francisco harbor. The voters of Los Angeles believe that it is to their pecuniary interest to retard the progress of this city; and for the State at large they have no love and no solicitude. It is the mean, narrow commercial spirit of envy that moves them in all their political activities. It is the same spirit that throws us into moral spasms. The people of Los Angeles are moral in the sense that they are for honesty in the mechanics of government; in the sense that they are in favor of an all-sufficient perfection of arrangement which shall conduce to their physical welfare, but of spiritual morality they have very little.

Misunderstanding of the Verdict

Among other deductions made by the physchological scientists of the press is one with respect to the significance of Judge Dunne's election. They tell us that his election means that the people of San Francisco are still behind the Graft Prosecution. That there should be an impassable gulf between their premises and their conclusion is of no concern to them. It is not to be denied that many people voted for Judge Dunne on the theory that a vote for him was an expression of confidence in the Graft Prosecution, but Judge Dunne did not receive a majority of the votes cast at the election. He did not receive within three thousand of the number of votes cast for Judge Cabaniss, who received no support from any powerful faction, in whose behalf no falsehoods were propagated, no deceptions practised; and who appealed to the suffrages of the people as an impartial judge and not as the faithful adherent of a righteous cabal or as the avowed enemy of any fellow creature. Of the sixty-three thousand votes cast at the election Judge Dunne received much less than one-half. And it is fairly certain that two or three thousand of the votes which he received were cast not for him but for the tickets on which he ran. In the circumstances it is quite clear that despite his election Judge Dunne was not vindicated by the verdict of the people. It is also quite clear that the people did not affirm their confidence in the Graft Prosecution. From an analysis of the vote we must conclude, notwithstanding the election of Judge Dunne, that the electorate of this city cannot be impeached of ignorance or depravity. The people have not affirmatively declared that they want men on the bench who will seek their favor by gratifying popular passion. The probability is that the true principles of justice are well understood by the people of this city and that they appreciate the importance of having men on the bench who will administer justice without fear, favor or prejudice; who regard their oath as sacred and who, even to accomplish something devoutly to be wished by all good men cannot be induced to pervert the law.

Slander as an Aid to Morality

The probability is, too, that the people of this city are sensible of the mischievous effects of the Schmitz trial; effects that cannot be counteracted; that can only be mitigated by time. Doubtless many of the people that did vote for Judge Dunne have no personal or partisan interest in the graft prosecution and are opposed to him mainly for the reason that to give color to his affectation of honesty of purpose in the Schmitz case he calumniated all of the ten judges of the two courts by whom he was reversed. To those men he imputed sinister motives; not upon any testimony or evidence; not because of his presumption of superiority to them in knowledge of law, (for that would be too preposterous even for Judge Dunne), but merely to cast a slur that might impair the weight and force of their authority. And ever since, the men and newspapers with whom Judge Dunne has identified himself, in the hope of redeeming him from merited odium, have kept the Schmitz case under discussion, applying thereto their customary principles of misrepresentation and thus seeking to justify the original blast of villificaiton. That they have not made much progress we infer from the election. But that they have made any is deplorable. Not even David Starr Jordan who is engaged in his latest flirtation with the prosecutors will deny that it is deplorable to cultivate in the public mind distrust of the whole Supreme Court and the Court of Appeal of this District. David Starr Jordan in all probability is acquainted with some of the judges, and if so, it is safe to say, that he does not believe they are dishonest. But unless he believes they are all dishonest he cannot conscientiously endorse an enterprise masquerading as a moral enterprise, which deems it essential to its purposes to assassinate their character. It is inconceivable that a man of his putative intelligence is convinced of the sincerity of men who pretend to be laboring for the civic welfare and who are devoting most of their time to the slandering of the State's highest tribunal and the abuse of a citizen who has contributed so much to the well-being of the State as Chief Justice Beatty.

The Simple Truth

That Mr. Heney and his associates are deliberately engaged in a conspiracy to blacken the character of our Supreme Court by premeditated misrepresentation is evident from the ponderous letter written by the chief prosecutor for publication a few days before the election. The purpose of this letter obviously was to reopen discussion of the Schmitz case and supply a pretext for comment by the Spreckels organs. In this letter Mr. Heney bases his argument on the postulate that the Court declared the indictment against Schmitz invalid because it failed to allege that the defendant was the Mayor of San Francisco. Starting with this assumption he proceeds to argue that the Court should have taken judicial cognizance of the fact of Schmitz's official position. Now Mr. Heney very well knows that the question whether the Court might take judicial notice of Schmitz's position was subsidiary and collateral and that the conclusion reached did not depend on its solution. He knows this quite as well as he knows that the Court did not decide that blackmail is not a crime. Though not a great lawyer Mr. Heney is not unfamiliar with the elementary principles on which the Schmitz decision is based. He knows, for example, and will not argue to the contrary, that a valid indictment is essential to due process of law and that the Constitution of the State and the Constitution of the United States forbid deprivation of liberty without due process of law; he knows that the indictment in the Schmitz case was invalid because it failed to charge that the defendant resorted to unlawful means to accomplish his purpose; and knowing these things, he must be sensible of the truth of Justice Beatty's statement that "It has not been held that there is anything wrong with the law, but only that there has been a failure to charge the acts which the law makes punishable, and, that there can be no valid conviction without a valid accusation." The simple truth of the whole story is that in omitting the allegation that Schmitz was Mayor it became necessary to make certain other allegations which, unfortunately, were also omitted. As a matter of fact the allegation that Schmitz was Mayor was omitted from the indictment intentionally, the reason being that Section 521 of the Penal Code provides that every person "who commits any extortion under color of official right" is "guilty of a misdemeanor." Had the allegation been made that Schmitz was Mayor the indictment would have charged a misdemeanor and not a felony; for it would have been a charge of extortion "under color of official right" and not by means of force and fear. A conviction of misdemeanor would not have worked forfeiture of office, a circumstance which makes it apparent why the prosecutors did not allege that Schmitz was Mayor. They undertook to dodge the law, and in this they might have been successful had they been smart enough to assert that which was made essential by reason of intentional omission. It was charged that Schmitz threatened the French restaurant keepers that if money were not paid him he would prevent them from obtaining a liquor license; but it was not stated how the defendant proposed to do this, or how it was understood by the restaurant keepers that he would accomplish it; "whether," as Justice Beatty says, "by fair persuasion and lawful influence over the commissioners, or by duress, menace, fraud or undue influence exercised upon them." To prosecute a man for a threat you must make it clear that it was a criminal threat. This is elemental law of which Mr. Heney is not ignorant. He thought that the Supreme Court would be so afraid of public opinion that it would not dare to interpret the law correctly, and now that he has suffered defeat he seeks to cover the Court with obloquy. And the services of David Starr Jordan have been enlisted in this malevolent enterprise.

Hughes and Folk

There are certain matters which appear to have escaped the attention of the sacrosanct patriots who are auguring from recent happenings in the East the speedy regeneration of politics and the triumph of their own pious projects. They are pointing with all their fingers to the election of Governor Hughes in New York as evidence of the awakening of the public conscience and proof that in this enlightened age the reformer is appreciated by the people. But they have nothing to say of the discrediting of Joe Folk by the people of St. Louis. Now Hughes and Folk are two distinct types of reformers. Hughes is a man of courage and principle who would scorn to play the demagogue. He is a reformer in the best sense of the term—a man intent on abating evils in public life and improving the public service, too high minded to beguile the people with the tricks of the politician or the pretensions of the Pharisee. Folk is nothing more than a pot-house politician who goes about after the manner of our local reformers with an air of superior virtue, ostentatiously priding himself on his hatred of human weaknesses and his eagerness to send men to jail. Men of the Folk type, when under proper restraint, may do some good in the world, but they never endear themselves to the public. There are psychological moments accompanying moral spasms in which such men are able to seize and hold the imagination of the people, but they never wear well. There is a certain amount of selfishness in all of us; and too many of us are inclined to measure other people's corn by our own bushel and to vindicate ourselves by affecting horror at the acts of others, but with all the inherent uncharitableness of human nature we revolt in time against the man who, to promote his own interests, makes of himself an instrument for the infliction of suffering on others. In our sober and unimpassioned moments we realize the ugliness of those self-righteous embodiments of the mischievous heresy that hate rather than love is the ruling principle of Christianity.

Parkhurst Quits

In this connection it is worth while considering the resignation of the Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst, censor of mayors, police commissioners and municipal government in general, from the Society for the Prevention of Crime. Dr. Parkhurst's labors of city reform, which have resulted in more disclosures of municipal ills and caused more pulpit movements than any civic force of the last two decades, have come to an end. Did Dr. Parkhurst effect any lasting reform? Have any of the evils which Dr. Parkhurst combatted ceased to exist? There is just as much rottenness in the politics of New York to-day as there was when the Lexow investigation which Dr. Parkhurst instigated came to a close. That investigation was held in 1894, and since then Dr. Parkhurst has conducted innumerable crusades, but the red light district still flourishes, and police officials are still accumulating wealth beyond the dreams of avarice, and Tammany's power is unbroken. But the vociferous reformer will not be forgotten. A few of his epigrams survive, and from the most famous of them, "Hell with the lid off"—a description of New York after a Tammany return to power—the word "lid" was derived for colloquial use. Doubtless Dr. Parkhurst did much temporary good in producing moral spasms, but he has learned that permanent reform is not to be effected by noise and legislative devices. His sincerity, however, is not to be questioned. Free from political ambition no ulterior purpose actuated him in his career as a reformer.

The Hammers

Bp Ralph Hodgson

Noise of hammers once I heard,
Many hammers, busy hammers,
Beating, shaping, night and day,
Shaping, beating dust and clay
To a palace; saw it reared;
Saw the hammers laid away.

And I listened, and I heard
Hammers beating, night and day,
In the palace newly reared,
Beating it to dust and clay,
Other hammers, muffled hammers,
Silent hammers of decay.

"ALSO"

My Prophetic Soul

An Essay in Political Prognosis Based Upon the Fact as Developed and Demonstrated by the Recent Election and the Trend of Preceding Tendencies of American Sentiment and Opinion Concerning the Necessity for a Strong Government to Enhance the Business Interests of the Nation.

By Democritus

On mature consideration, assisted by the overwhelming result, I am convinced that fear contributed more than did the votes to the issue of the late election. Votes unquestionably elected Mr. Taft to the presidency; but fear inspired the votes. I believe that thousands of citizens would have voted for Mr. Bryan as the representative of Democratic principles, if they had not been afraid of electing him. I do not say that they were entirely afraid of Mr. Bryan personally; although many of them were probably also somewhat alarmed by what they considered his "radicalism"; the apprehension generally among those who would like to adhere to Democratic principles as the basis of their political faith was chiefly due to the fear of consequences resulting from a change of the administration. They feared that "business" would be disturbed. They feared that the existing order would be diverted. They feared innovation. They feared that values would be shifted. They feared that the "demnition bowwows" would be immediately imminent—and if there is anything the average, conservative American dislikes and distrusts more than another it is the "demnition bowwows."

If Thomas Jefferson had been the Democratic candidate in place of William Jennings Bryan, the result would have been the same; William Howard Taft would have been elected President of the United States. The citizens did not vote as Democrats and Republicans; they did not vote their political principles; they voted their business judgment. They argued that the election of Mr. Taft would be better for the business interests of the country than would be election of Mr. Bryan. Political principle was sacrificed on the bargain counter in the gilded temple of the Great God Biz.

Only the "solid South" voted the principles of its citizenry. Some old-fashioned Americans in the New England states also probably voted for Mr. Taft on principle, believing that a Republican administration is the only bulwark of the republic because it assisted the union Democrats to save the republic fifty-four years ago. The Democrats of the South will not submit to a Democracy modified to fit modern exigencies; and the Republicans of New England will not admit that the Republican party was originally an emergency party and has since merely adapted itself to the business interests of a steadily increasing commercial and industrial population.

Many of those who voted for Mr. Bryan had nothing to lose and hoped for much to gain. With these it was only a question of Bryanism or Socialism, and they were not quite ready to adopt Socialism is their rule of politics. The majority of those who voted for Mr. Taft have prospered under the administration of President Roosevelt and were taking no chances by chasing after strange gods. They were wedded to their idol in the gilded temple of the Great God. The "business man" feared for the income of his business; the wage-worker feared for the maximum of his wage; the trust magnate trusted to his future ability to keep things as they are until he can make them better for the trust interests; the money lender was satisfied with his usury and would run no risk with new-fangled politics or a political regime regulated by Jeffersonian simplicity; the politician saw no better chance of power, place and emolument under a Bryan administration than had prevailed under Roosevelt, and was content to stay with his Egyptian fleshpots; and the office holder, knowing on which side his bread was buttered, took care to keep it butter side up.

The nation has merely taken another long stride towards its inevitable goal—imperialism. Principles have been definitely subordinated to "business." What the majority of the American people are now demanding is a "strong," permanent government—a government that will make business better. It is now conceded that the nomination of Mr. Taft was equivalent to his election—that there has never been the slightest doubt of his success; that as soon as his name was mentioned the great majority of the citizens of the United States made up their minds to vote for him; not because they preferred Taft to Bryan, but because they preferred the existing administration to a new one—because they feared the consequences of an abrupt change. It was the administration that elected Mr. Taft. This accounts for the "apathy" of the campaign. There was nothing to quarrel about. The only principle involved was "business"; the equilibrium of trade; the preservation of existing conditions.

As it was easy, on this analysis of the result, to predict the election of Mr. Taft from his nomination, it is equally easy to predict his re-election four years hence, upon the same base of forecast. Mr. Taft is not going to spoil his future by departing from the way that President Roosevelt has trod. He will not cavort and prance as President Roosevelt has done in his coltish moods; Mr. Taft is not built upon the Roosevelt plan; but "my policies" will be Taft's policies and Roosevelt's politics will be Taft's politcs; he will not be entreated to leave them nor to return from following after them.

As it is easy to predict the re-election of Taft four years hence, so it is easy to predict the election of Roosevelt to succeed Taft. That will break the third term rule; and after that—the monarchy or the deluge. We have already drifted far enough from the political principles of the forefathers to regard another term of Roosevelt—a soberer, sedater, wiser, sexegenarian Roosevelt—with business-like complacency. We have passed the revolutionary period of our fierce democracy; we have settled to a business basis; ours has become a Punic policy, a commercial attitude in all our relations; as the merchant kings of Carthage allowed no question of liberty or patriotism to interfere with the profits of their far-flung sea traffic or their caravan trade to Ophir, Golcenda and Tadmor in the desert, so we of this later western empire are determined that nothing shall interfere with our purpose to establish a government of business, by business and for business. We do not yet fully realize that we have already entered the royal road that leads to a throne. We only know that we desire a "strong and permanent government"; and we have decided that as long as business is good we will perpetuate the government that has, in our opinion, made business good. We have come to believe that business depends on the government. All that is necessary, therefore, is to so regulate the affairs of the administration that it shall not be charged in the two or three succeeding campaigns for the presidency, that the policies of the government are responsible for bad business.

Therefore I cast the national horoscope as follows: Taft and Taft and Roosevelt—and thereafter as many Roosevelts as nature may permit; and after Roosevelt another Roosevelt, the Caesar named Roosevelt, or the Man on Horseback.

An Obsession

By Bernardo Couto Castillo

In a small piece of Louis XV furniture that I recently bought I found, in the bottom of a drawer, the letter which you may here read:

My Dear Friend:

What I write you is going to move you profoundly; but you have no idea of the state of excitement and grief in which I find myself. You, the best comrade of my earlier days, who knew all my joys and all my sorrows—you are the only one who can hear and console me in my desolation. Come, come and live by my side and be the same companion as you were in the past times; only, now I shall not laugh, nor shall I be the noisy devil I then was. Come, my friend, I fear for my reason, which is even now trembling.

You will remember that, a little time after you had abandoned the wild and riotous life we lived together so long, to shut yourself up wisely in a den of peace and labor—you will remember I wrote you saying: "Friend, at last I have found what I wanted: the submissive and silent creature at whose side I can shelter myself, the being made for love, tolerant of my caprices, humble to my desires, who, from today, is going to be my companion." I spoke to you of her, of her peaceful face, of her look serene and receptive, of her hair parted in the center of the forehead and flowing straight over her temples, like that of a pre-Raphaelite virgin. I explained to you the "problem of conscience" in which I found myself involved, for, being an honest girl, duty demanded of me to give her my name, while my convictions, or I should say my stupid preoccupations, opposed any kind of official and definite bond. I knew well that she asked for nothing but to obey me; her mother, her house, all would be sacrificed to my least desire; with the same pleasure—what do I say?—with the same enthusiasm, she would have gone to the church as to the poorest of places designated by me. In her poor woman's life I was the hope, the unquestionable love, the welcome that she awaited, soon to be delivered. With my habitual egotism and carelessness, I said "Time enough yet!" and I made her mine.

Her mother died, and I had to bring her to live with me, without thinking to give her a position, preoccupied solely from the enchantment that emanated from her delightful personality.

You cannot figure to yourself the two years of complete felicity that I passed by her side. I never before had believed in happiness, I had never believed that a man in any way refined could, without a great struggle, stand the same caresses, the same features, and the same things for two long years. Very well! I, the skeptical egotist you have known, even I have been happy by the side of one woman, happy as only a man can be who is destined to pay very dearly for it, as now happens to me.

During the two years' life of my passion I never dreamed of deceiving her. Do not be astonished, for you never knew her; she never had the same kiss twice, nor repeated a caress; never from her small lips came vulgar phrases; she engendered every seduction and every goodness; she was indulgent, and you know there is most desire to deceive when the demon of perversity moves most, and when contrarieties and inopportune jealousies are aroused. While terrors awoke in her for the honor given, as with the true lover, while she did not know, while no one came to instill doubts in her conscience, there never passed through her mind the idea that I could be false; I was for her all that was loving, as she was for me all that was adorable.

You remember Charles? Well, to him and to him alone I owe my misfortune. He, the hidden black hand that wounds forever; he, the false friend born to sting like a viper, mortally, traitorously; he, the miserable Iago, entered into my house to torment me, to envenom my blood, and to bring down the night on our happiness. You know that I sought him, to provoke him to a duel, in which he had the good fortune to wound me; he whom I should have annihilated with the sheer force of my hatred.

One day, on arriving home, I found Julia all in tears. You can imagine my grief, when to my caresses she answered only with reproaches. I wanted to know, I demanded—and I knew. The wretch who had been seated daily at my table, smiling, had spoken to her of me; of my past; of the women that I had known, and of all that I had ever done. He had cited dates, given proofs, and had told her that my intention was to act in the like way with her. If I had not married, if up till now I had denied her my name, it was in order to be able to abandon her with impunity, once I got tired of her. The poor, loving creature was trembling with grief, when, between her sobs, she murmured this declaration.

In vain I endeavored to console her. After the tears came angry reproaches; the fury of the woman who, confiding until then, beheld herself utterly deceived, had awakened in her. I was not what she had believed, nor he whom she loved. Then came the despair that wishes to wound, to avenge itself, and a new being was revealed before me; the weak, the submissive, the good and loving creature was turned into the raging lioness that wished only to tear and destroy.

"You shall marry me," she kept saying. "I will not be as the others, no, you shall not deceive me. Oh, no, no! You shall marry me! You shall marry me!" And this cry burst continually from her rage, like froth from agitated water. In her kindled look there was hatred and disdain; and my pride, my stupid man's pride, rose up against what I had loved most, against what I felt I loved still even in that moment in which I did not know her.

"Marry!" I cried. "And who shall oblige me? You, who came of your own pleasure?"

On my words there followed a period of silence; I saw her terrified on her part at seeing my anger rise against her, a force against her own just resentment. Then, after a brief pause, and taking some aimless steps, she moved to the night-table at her side, and taking a revolver, she cried mechanically: "You shall marry me—you shall; or I——

I laughed, I made an effort to throw my irony into it, and pallid, without saying a word, she placed the muzzle against my forehead. She looked at me one instant, with a look that I have never since been able to forget, with an indescribable look that follows me in the shadows of the nights, and haunts me in my evil dreams. In the expression of that look there were determination and reproaches, but reproaches full of love. I did not move a step; I did not make a gesture; I did not raise my arm to detain her—on the contrary, with a perverse curiosity, I waited, and even seemed to defy her with my attitude.

A report, and I threw myself forward; just in time to receive her in my arms—one last convulsive tremor, then a gush of blood covering her face and bathing her body.

Who can describe exactly and analyze all that I felt that night, watching over her who had loved me so tenderly, her whom I clearly felt I loved more and more, now that she was no more! I have only vague recollections. The white of her hands, the corpse-like lividness

An Indian Fighter Succeeds Funston

General Smith the New Commander of the Department of California, Has a Brilliant Record as a Soldier—His Effective Work in the Phillipines

The Department of California which has been under the command of Colonel Maus since Brigadier-General Funston went to Fort Leavenworth is now commanded by Brigadier-General Frederick A. Smith, who, three weeks ago, was Colonel of the Eighth Infantry and on duty at Fort McDowell. Though General Smith is known in the service as one of the most gallant and efficient of officers his promotion to the rank of brigadier-general came as a great surprise to the army, as it was not known that he was being considered. It was thought that the appointment would go either to the engineers or the cavalry arm, but President Roosevelt's attention was called to the fact that only four of the fourteen brigadier-generals were appointed from the infantry whereas seven were from the cavalry, two from the artillery and one from the volunteers. General Smith was tenth in the list of infantry colonels, and he jumped such officers as Cols. J. W. Duncan, Sixth Infantry; R. W. Hoyt, Twenty-fifth Infantry, and M. P. Maus, Twentieth Infantry.

General Smith has had a very interesting career and he has seen lots of active service. When he graduated from West Point in 1873 he reported for duty as second lieutenant of the Twentieth Infantry at Angel Island and after a stay of a few days he went with his company to Redding to act as a guard with a battery of the Fourth Artillery for the purpose of conducting Modoc Indian prisoners from Fort Klamath, Ore., to Fort Russell, Wyo. This was after Captain Jack, the chief of the Modocs, was hung, and the remaining prisoners were then taken East. Lieut. Smith then returned to Angel Island, where he remained until July, 1875, going from there to Camp Bidwell, Cal. While on duty at the latter post, he was placed in command of a detachment of cavalry which was sent to investigate the trouble between Piute Indians and settlers at Painter's Flat, Nev. He was promoted to first lieutenant in 1878, and became adjutant of the regiment, serving as such for over eight years. His regiment was stationed in Arizona until the summer of 1882, and during that time Lieut. Smith was engaged in building and repairing the military telegraph line, and was also in the field against Indians.

In 1887 Lieutenant Smith was on duty at Fort Yates, Dak. He became a captain in 1890, and was adjutant and executive officer of the Columbian Guard during the World's Fair at Chicago. He was in Nebraska at the beginning of the war with Spain, and was appointed adjutant-general of the infantry division of Camp George H. Thomas, Chicamauga Park, and also of the First Brigade. In May, 1898, he became acting assistant adjutant-general of the United States forces and of the Fifth Army Corps under Gen. Shafter at Tampa and Santiago, Cuba, until July, 1898, also acting as mustering officer for the corps. He was then appointed chief commissary of subsistence of volunteers with the rank of major and assigned to the Department of the Lakes. After being honorably discharged from the volunteer service in June, 1899, he was promoted to a majority in the First Infantry. His connection with the Twelfth Infantry extended over twenty-six years. During his long service with that regiment, Gen. Smith was associated with Brig.-Gen. William W. Wotherspoon, General Staff, and president of the Army War College. Gen. Wotherspoon served with the Twelfth Infanty for nearly twenty-eight years.

While in the Philippines, on his first tour, he was assigned to clean up the island of Marinduque, then in the height of its insurrection. Capt. Devereux Shields and fifty-one men of Company F of the Twenty-ninth United States Volunteer Infantry had been captured by the insurgents in September, 1900. Major Smith was a member of the expedition under Brig.-Gen. Luther R. Hare and Col. George S. Anderson, Thirty-eighth United States Volunteer Infantry, which was sent out after the insurgents. The American prisoners were delivered to Gen. Hare at Buena Vista on Sunday, October 14th. Capt. Shields had been shot twice and badly wounded, and four members of his regiment were killed. Returning to this country, Major Smith acted as president of the board which revised and wrote the present infantry drill regulations.

Gen. Smith also served in the campaign in Samar, Philippine Islands, and in February, 1901, he was detailed to the Inspector-General's Department, serving until July, 1902, when he was promoted to lieutenant-colonel of the Twenty-ninth Infantry. Gen. Smith did not serve at all with his regiment, but was again detailed as an inspector-general. He did not have any regimental duties until he was promoted to the colonelcy of the Eighth Infantry in January, 1904. Gen. Smith left this city in the spring of 1906 for the Philippines, returning home a short time ago. During his tour of duty in the islands, Gen. Smith rendered excellent service. His regiment had been engaged almost all the time it had been there in service against the Pulajanes in Leyte and Samar. He was in personal charge of the field of operations of all the military detachments in both islands during the time of the Pulajane campaigns. He was famous in the Philippines for his expertness as a rifle shot; and he was credited with having done more to bring order out of the chaotic condition of things in Samar and Leyte than any other officer in the army. By the system for field operations which he established in the island the recalcitrant mountain people were driven into the arms of the civil government officials.

General Smith has the distinction of having had less leave of absence than any officer of his rank in the army. His first vacation was taken two years after he left the Military Academy, and he did not take another until compelled to do so on account of sickness in May, 1879. Since then he has taken no long leave of absence.

A Poet's Income

When the professional writers of local eminence were asked to "contribute something" to "The Spinners' Book of Fiction," it was understood that every dollar of profit from the publication was to be used for the immediate relief of the necessities of Miss Ina D. Coolbrith, California's only poet whose poetry is all of California. This assistance was not asked in the spirit of charity, but rather as a fraternal tribute from poets in prose to one who sings in verse. The stories were written; the book was published; and if memory serves there was a "presentation reception," or something of that sort in San Jose, to commemorate the good deed. Now it develops that the ostensible beneficiary of this fund has been receiving from the sale of the book only one cent a copy while the Spinners get 20 cents. The income of Miss Coolbrith from this source has been about $4.15 a month, and her total receipts have amounted to $90.80. Internal dissensions among the Spinners regarding the payment of this money have reached the knowledge of Miss Coolbrith, chiefly through the blatant columns of the daily press; and rather than endure the humiliation of the position in which such discussion places her, she has returned all the money she has received and resigned from honorary membership in the organization. Such in bald outline is the story of this sordid transaction. It is pitiful. Why should this gifted woman be beholden to anyone for money? Or, since poverty must be the lot of all poets not born rich or who may be incapable of coining drachmas from the sweat of their brows and the fag-drip of their brains, why should the circumstance that they are not money-getters and are therefore sometimes dependent on the generosity of friends for the price of a crust, be placarded on the deadwall of publicity, a gaping-stock for gossips and a theme for the canting sympathy for Philistines and Pharisees? There may be another side to this story, but I know, personally, that the contributors to that "Book of Fiction" wrote their stories for Miss Coolbrith and not for the Spinners. If any of the money for that publication is being held back, or "invested in railroad bonds," or sequestered in any manner whatever, it is contrary to the wish of the writers and wholly without their authority. If the book has been a financial failure and if the Spinners have expended money from their treasury to sustain the Coolbrith fund let them repay themselves out of any money now in that fund, send the remainder if there be any, to Miss Coolbrith, and permit the incident to be closed forever. If it shall be necessary to alleviate the physical necessities of this poet hereafter, let others than the grudging ones perform the rite of hospitality. Once upon a time, in the long, long ago, this poet laid a wreath of laurel on the grave of another "born unto singing":

"Where eyes are closed, divine and young,
Dusked in a night no morn may break,
And hushed the poet lips that sung
The songs none else may wake.
Unfelt the venomed arrow-thrust,
Unheard the lips that hiss disgrace,
While the sad heart is dust, and dust
The beautiful, sad face."

And some day a kindred poet will lay a wreath of immortelles and violets on the place where this poet's eyes are "dusked in a night no morn may break," in loving tribute to "the poet lips that sung the songs none else may make." Then, indeed, will the clamor of the dollar-grudging Pharisee and the dollar-chasing Philistine be stilled for a moment; and then, for a brief, solemn space it will be possible to hear as she heard all her life, "in blade and blossom, sweet small voices, odorous, tender pleaders in her cause," that shall speak her as she was.

A Duel Averted

It was far from being a Sabbath stillness that brooded over the Bohemian Club last Sunday morning when Dr. Shields and MacKenzie Gordon came to a misunderstanding. As a matter of fact the Sabbath had not been ushered in by the tolling of church bells, but it was long past Saturday night; somewhere in the neighborhood of the witching hour when churchyards yawn. Dr. Shields and Mr. Gordon had contributed to the gayety of a dinner in honor of that perennial motif of festive gatherings, the Hon. Joe Redding, famous as the most versatile of geniuses. Now it is almost proverbial that a Redding dinner usually winds up at breakfast. Hence it was not unseemly that Mr. Gordon and Dr. Shields, who were among the star performers at the dinner, should be in their Tuxedos at the club on Sunday morning. But let us hasten to the meat of the misunderstanding. It was all on account of a dispute over the mimetic and artistic abilities of certain distinguished amateurs, and that sweet singer, Mr. Gordon affronted Dr. Shields by plunging into personalities with almost fatal indiscretion. There was at once talk of a duel. Indeed there was a good deal of duel talk, and there is no telling how the talk might have ended had not Dr. Jones butted in with some very harsh suggestions. He called attention to the fact that the morning papers would soon be going to press, and that there would be no time for them to get pictures if immediate action were not taken. This ended further discussion and all present resumed their merriment.

Michaels Saved the Day

By Hercules, as Trimalchio would say, that man Michaels is a shrewd toastmaster. Everybody knows that Frank Michaels is ponderous in everything but wit, but everybody doesn't know what a wonderful tactician he is in an emergency. At a dinner given not long ago in honor of a distinguished visitor Frank Michaels officiated as toastmaster, and with rare deftness he conducted the post-prandial flow of soul. In the most felicitous manner the several speakers were introduced, and some very brilliant things were said, but unfortunately a contretemps occurred. One of the speakers, a physician, rose to his feet bubbling over with sentiments that were far from grateful to the guest of honor. Then it was that the tactfulness of the toastmaster was displayed. He tackled his job, I am told, with masterly ingenuity, and though he could not stem the flow of pungent sentiments he succeeded in smoothing out the wrinkles and abating the embarrassment of all concerned. It was a great triumph for Frank Michaels. As for the indiscreet doctor, I am told that he has been felicitating himself on having made the best speech of the evening.

More of the Old Atmosphere

Every little bit of the old distinctive atmosphere that comes back to San Francisco awakens a deep sentimental interest and is most gratifying to all that cherish recollections of the life that was extinguished. How quick the emotions are to respond to everything that brings back the sweet savor of things that were was shown last week on the occasion of the opening of the new California Market when thousands of people journeyed from all sections of the city to the spot that was once so pleasing to the senses. How glad they were to find the renascence! So perfect has been the reproduction that it seems as though nothing had ever happened to the old market. The stalls are situated the same as before, and not an odor is missing save that which emanated from the dungeons beneath, where, occasionally, rat-killing matches furnished entertainment for lovers of that cruel sport. Along with that odor has vanished, also, the Bunker who made Bunker's sausage as famous as Bunker Hill. Not long before the fire this distinguished artist in sausages was on the point of bringing suit against every butcher who had adopted his method. But now he is enjoying life on a farm and he has lost all interest in sausages. Appeals were made to him to return to the old stand, but in vain.

Hayes Will Placate Cannon

Some of Congressman Hayes's friends have been predicting that on the return of that gentleman to Washington he will meet with a chilling frost on account of his attempt to conciliate the labor vote by expressing disapproval of the methods and sentiments of Uncle Joe Cannon. Despite all the cant that was poured out in censure of that statesman and the efforts of Samuel Gompers to defeat him, he was re-elected by a substantial majority. As he is of course aware that the Congressmen who have pretended to regard his official conduct as deserving of reprehension were merely playing to the gallery, it is natural to suppose that he has very little respect for them and that he is not likely to go out of his way to assist them in ingratiating themselves with their constituents. But the politicians who are worrying about Congressman Hayes's prospects need not be apprehensive. The probability is, I am told, that the first telegram of congratulation received by Speaker Cannon was from the tactful Mr. Hayes. The latter's friends are of the opinion that he keeps Uncle Joe supplied with prunes from the Santa Clara Valley; also, that he can explain his position on the Speakership in a way that will be satisfactory to all concerned. Mr. Hayes has a large supply of the essentials of statesmanship.

"Chimmie Fadden" Townsend Defeated

That uniformly successful individual, Ned Townsend, has suffered his first keen disappointment. He ran for Congress somewhere in the wilds of New Jersey, where Chimmie Fadden was never a hero, and where literary genius is not appreciated, and his political ambition received a cold douche. But the creator of Chimmie Fadden and daughters of the tenement district has firmly resolved to enter Congress and he says he will try again. It is not generally known that this resolution was formed nearly twenty years ago when Townsend was private secretary to Senator George Hearst. Fresh from the San Francisco newspaper field, thrown into the mad whirl of national politics, the young journalist longed for the opportunity to enter upon the career of a statesman. As a newspaper man in this city he had acquired some familiarity with the ways of politicians and it occurred to him that perhaps some day he might work his way into Congress as the representative of a San Francisco district. But after his first big hit with his Chimmie Fadden sketches he ceased to give much thought to politics until a few years when he began the work which he had long contemplated—a history of the American Constitution. While engaged on the work, I am told, he resolved to seek the nomination for Congress at the earliest opportunity. Now he is in the fight to stay.

purveyor of fiction; that he is in reality an artist of exceptional genius. Many of them were pioneered to this discovery by Rudyard Kipling and William Marion Reedy. Mr. Kipling regards O. Henry not only as a writer, but one of the greatest in all literature. This is pretty high praise from pretty high authority. "O. Henry," whose true name is Sidney Porter, has been doing for New York what Bret Harte did for California. He is depicting in vivid colors the life of the metropolis. But in his characterizations he has not dealt exclusively with city types. He is a man of varied experience, having been cowboy, sheep-herder, merchant, miner, druggist and newspaper man; and from all the fields of activity in which he has labored he has drawn inspiration.

ment, Franz Stuck, is the subject of widespread discussion. He now occupies a unique position in the artistic world. It is the profound and arresting originality of his treatment of every theme he deals with that made him his reputation. It is his delight to carry the world back to the fairy-land of Greek legend where fauns and centaurs abound, and in this field he proves himself a great poet. The lyrical and poetical element predominates in his art. One of his most famous paintings is "Sin"—described as "a luxuriant woman with a pale amber visage framed in raven locks, a woman whose shiny eyes are animated with a smile, at once startled and sick with longing, while the cold body of a serpent presses its heavy coils round her form."

Stanford's Band of Brothers

What a unanimous lot they are down at Stanford just now, and what a pleasing contrast to the turmoil and strife and hullaballoo usual within those academic purlieus! Not a dissenting voice, of all the voices that utter wisdom to the callow youth of Palo Alto, in protest against the methods and practices of the graft prosecution! Surely it is good and pleasant for brethren to dwell togther in unity, but how strange in that environment! It is unquestionably like the precious ointment upon the head that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard: that went down to the skirts of his garment; but how seldom has the ointment trickled down upon the beard of Stanford's faculty, even down to the skirts of their scholastic garments. No doubt their present state of mind is as dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion; but what shall we say of the perturbations that have heretofore afflicted the mental status of these pundits and pedants upon slight provocation and upon no occasion at all? For lo, as it is written, even as it is written in the book of the prophet of the Lord, Zechariah, son of Berechiah, there has been a voice of the howling of the shepherds; for their glory was spoiled: a voice of the roaring of young lions; for the pride of Jordan was spoiled; and if ye believe me not, search the Scripture and be satisfied. And as it was prophesied by Jeremiah, the son of Hilkiah, who was official forecaster in Judah from about 629 to about 580 B. C. these shepherds have come up like a lion from the swelling of Jordan against the habitation of the strong; but if the prophesy is fulfilled they will suddenly run away, and Edom (which is the prophetic synonym for Stanford) shall be a desolation. Wherefore I suggest that before the desolation cometh to pass, before the pride of Jordan is spoiled, and while the faculty of Stanford is of one mind for the first time in the history of the university, honorary degrees be conferred by the President on Rudolph Spreckels, Francis J. Heney and William J. Burns. Then they can swell like Jordan. The Spreckels degree would entitle him to tag M. A. after his name and we may translate the initials as our humor dictates—artium magister if we approve the efforts of the graft prosecution; asinus magis or asinus magnus if we disapprove. For Heney is might be deemed sufficient to label him B. A. which is an inferior kind of the same species. As for Burns, let him have Stanford authority to sign immunity contracts, "William J. Burns, A. S. S." and trust to the erudition of those interested to supply the Latin equivalent of Argentarius Satalles Stipendium.

They Offended Clark

It would be too much to ask the large family at Stanford to dwell in harmony for more than two days. Immediately after agreeing on the virtues of our graft prosecution the inevitable row occurred. We are told that the latest suspensions at the Jordan university were ordered because of an insult offered to the co-eds on account of the posters advertising the Junior "Plug Ugly" by which it was announced that the Roble maids would appear in "General Arthur cigar wrappers." Though not a single co-ed was offended by the posters Dr. Jordan decreed that the vile insult must be wiped out. The students have another version of the matter. From them I learn that it was not the posters that moved the choler of the disingenuous Jordan, but the satirical smash that was taken at the unloved Professor A. B. Clark in the "Plug Ugly" farce. One of the students appeared in the farce in a makeup that gave him a striking resemblance to the professor. The character was that of the faculty's official executioner. Every time he appeared on the stage a long hook would issue from the wings and he would be dragged off before he could utter a sound. This performance greatly offended the sensitive drawing teacher.

The Poet Agnes Tobin Talked About

Several months ago San Francisco was introduced by Agnes Tobin to Francis Thompson, the Catholic poet of genius. Miss Tobin did not present Francis Thompson to us, but in a very interesting lecture she told us of the man who suffered and starved in the streets of London and who died last January, and she told us of the rare beauty of his poetry which has often been compared to Shelley's. Thompson is now being discussed in the literary circles of London, and recently the Dublin Review leapt into a second edition with an essay on Shelley written by Thompson, a tribute from a poet to a poet which has been hailed as a masterpiece of English prose. Thomson wrote this essay twelve years ago and tried to get it printed. But the ill-luck which dogged him all his life turned even this effort into failure. The article was rejected even by the very magazine which has made a tremendous hit by its posthumous publication.

Thompson on Shelley

Mr. Thompson declares, at the outset of his essay, that if we possess at the present day no lineal descendant (in the poetical order) of Shelley, it is largely "on account of the defect by which contemporary poetry of the early nineteenth century, is mildewed." That defect is the predominance of art over inspiration, of body over soul. "We are self-conscious to the finger-tips," Mr. Thompson asserts, "and this inherent quality, entailing on our poetry the inevitable loss of spontaneity, ensures that whatever poets, of whatever excellence, may be born to us from the Shelleian stock, its founder's spirit can take among us no reincarnation. An age that is ceasing to produce childlike children cannot produce a Shelley." "Know you," asks Mr. Thompson quaintly, "what it is to be a child? It is to be something very different from the man of today. It is to have a spirit yet streaming from the waters of baptism; it is to believe in love, to believe in loveliness, to believe in belief; it is to be so little that the elves can reach to whisper in your ear; it is to turn pumpkins into coaches, and mice into horses, lowness into loftiness, and nothing into everything, for each child has its fairy godmother in its own soul; it is to live in a nut-shell and count yourself the king of infinite space; it is to know not as yet that you are under sentence of life, nor petition that it be commuted into death." Now Shelly, according to Francis Thompson, possessed just this power of the childlike vision. To the last he was the enchanted child."

A Discriminating Policy

I don't blame the Chinese for harboring a feeling of "coldness" towards this government in resentment for our shabby treatment of that empire in sending a fag-end squadron of our junketing fleet to the by-port of Amoy. The Chinese are not a "proud and sensitive" folk like the Japanese; but they are versed in the minutest punctilio and they are age-long sticklers for all the courtesies of a formal etiquette and prescriptive ceremonial. It will not mollify the notables and mandarins of Pekin to inform them that a subtle diplomatic policy exhaling through the crevices of the State Department at Washington precluded any action on our part that would even hint of offense to our suspiring hosts of Tokio and Yokohama. The Chinese will readily understand why we did not send the same fleet that anchored in Yedo bay to Shanghai and Tientsin and Chefoo; but this understanding will not palliate their contempt for our cowardice. The Chinese are the wisest men of the Far East, as they are the most dependable in all transactions involving honesty and rectitude of purpose—which cannot be truthfully predicated of the Japanese. They have long since divined the meticulous character of our attitude towards the Japanese and they know that it is inspired by our fear that unless we kowtow in Tokio we may be compelled to use our battle fleet in an expensive effort to recover the Philippines and Hawaii from the clutch of the sudden invader. They know, too, that if we had proclaimed the Chinese equally "honorable" with the susurrous samurai by ordering the complete fleet to Chinese ports to be souped with birds' nests and solaced with the strident unmelody of the sing-song girls, we should have "lost face" with our near-ally whose geisha-hand we have so cordially clasped across the sea. But this knowledge does not ameliorate Chinese disgust for our "policy." On the contrary it only serves to accentuate an already well-defined opinion that in our newly-acquired dignity as a "world power" we have ceased to maintain ourselves as the invincible republic whose eagle continually doth scream.

Some Solemn Nincompoops

The dispatches announce unfriendly editorial utterances by the British press in China. With awkward irony these newspapers approve of sending a squadron to China instead of the whole fleet upon the ground that to have done otherwise would have "shown a lack of consideration of British sensibility," and nullified "America's gamble in opening a commercial lottery after returning an indemnity to which she was not entitled." Now what do you think of that for pure, unadulterated, composite, blown-in-the-bottle British gall? Doen't it jar you? British sensibility! Great Britain, you must know, owns China by right of conquest in the Opium War, of which the self-respecting and wholly self-satisfied British shopkeeper vociferously canting in Exeter Hall, is not more than half ashamed even at this late day. British sensibility! British fiddlesticks! And that allusion to the "indemnity to which we are not entitled"—isn't it enough to turn the stomach of an honest, square-dealing American to hear the discarded servitor of a London penny weekly discourse of unearned indemnities? The sneer is out of place even on the lips of an exiled citizen of the boldest robber nation on earth. Yes, we gave back a portion of that indemnity because we were not entitled to it; because it was loot; because it was thieve's swag. We gave it back; but the others, Great Britain among them, are still in possession of the stolen goods. Wherefore it ill becomes the unrepentant thief to mock the fellow on the other cross. Journalism in China is decayed British, and that is to say that it is "nasty mean" and "beastly under-bred" when it is not dull, stupid and staled with the effluvium of its own flatulent egotism. However, Editor Shea or O'Shea, of the British press of Shanghai is likely to go to jail or pay a heavy fine for libeling Judge Wilfley of the American Supreme Court in that city, and that will be some compensation for the O'Sheaisms of the other British editors in China.

Relics of Ancient Giants

The University of California attracted so much attention among archeologists when Professor Merriam discovered the remains of sabre tooth tigers and other rare prehistoric animals in the now famous asphalt sink that inspired Stanford agents have been actively scouting in that section of the State hoping to discover fossil remains of equal importance. Some two weeks ago they succeeded in locating a most desirable lot of fossils but the original discoverer refused to sell them notwithstanding the high price offered by the Stanford savants. This new find consists of elephants bones and the skulls of men who were between seven and eight feet tall. Carl Borg, the well known artist, uncovered the remains while sketching and exploring on San Nicholas Island, near Santa Barbara. Singularly enough San Nicholas was known among the early Spaniards as the "Isle of Skulls." Up to the time of Borg's important find antiquarians had recognized it as a place rich in historical relics but no attempt was made to mine the strata. The elephant bones found by Borg are the first that have been located there. Now there is a rush of scientists to that locality and the ground is being systematically delved. Others are working the strip of land from Santa Barbara to the Mexican line as signs have been found that it contains treasures in fossil remains.

'Which,' sez Tahalor, 'proves,' sez he, 'that an absolootely imparshil investigashin is to be made into th' conduct iv th' accused.' Next comes th' name iv th' Rev. Father D. O. Crowley iv——"

"Yis," said Clancy, "but in this instance I'm afraid that he's guarantayed be th' Bulletin. Th' best iv men get into bad company occashinilly."

"But surely you've got confidinse in Father Crowley," said Flannagan.

"Yes," said Clancy, "but afther all your confidinse in a man is what he makes it. When Riley was about to be thried f'r manslaughter his lawyer sez 'Have you condinse in th' jury?' Sez Riley, 'I'll tell you when they bring in th' verdict.' "

"Depind on Father Crowley," said Flannagan.

"Me confidinse is wobblin'," said Clancy. "Father Crowley has consinted to be appinted to investigate something that he has no power to investigate. Th' charges aginst th' Gra-aft Prosecushin is that they have committed greater crimes than th' crimes they are thryin' to punish, an' as because iv their crimes it behooves them to do all in their power to save thimselves from disgrace and the punishment they dizerve, they should not have conthrol iv th' machinery iv justice. To investigate these charges a comitay must have th' power to put men undher oath an' compel thim to prochuce documents. If Father Crowley is in no posishin to do these things then he is participatin' in a hippodrome."

"I won't go that far with you," said Flannagan.

"Shtay where you are," said Clancy.

"I see the Grand Prix hotel has failed."

"Yes, it's out of date. It began to run down right after the management put in immunity baths for the Grand Jurors stopping there."

Reid for Senator

The news comes from New York that D. O. Mills's son-in-law, Whitelaw Reid, now Ambassador to Great Britain, has announced himself as a candidate for United States Senator to succeed Mr. Platt. Reid is one of the most active of politicians. He was minister to the French Republic under President Harrison. He was nominated for Vice-President by the Minneapolis convention in 1892 and went down to defeat with Harrisan. With the advent of President McKinley Mr. Reid was an applicant for the Ambassadorship to Great Britain, but Senator Platt was strong in his objections and Senator Platt's objections were supported by other notable Republicans. Senator Platt even went so far as to write a personal letter to President McKinley, which might be found either in the files of the State Departmnt or in the late President's private papers at Canton, and Mr. McKinley did not appoint Mr. Reid. Shortly after the advent of President Roosevelt Mr. Reid became Ambassador to Great Britain.

Odd Things in the World

The Rolling Stone of the Peerage

Lord Lyveden, who distinguished himself when the Argonaut foundered after colliding with a tramp steamer recently, has been called the rolling stone of the peerage, so many have been his vocations and adventuers. After leaving Eton he was plucked for the army, but re-enlisted in the Third Battalion Highland Light Infantry. He left the service after a time and went on the stage, playing for some seasons with Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft at the Haymarket Theatre as Percy Vernon. He never got beyond speaking parts of a few lines, the most important being the captain of a liner in Buckstone's famous old play, "The Overland Route," in which piece, curiously enough, the big scene is the foundering of a steamer. He had some curious experiences afterward in America, including the running of a nursery garden in North Carolina and owning a fishery at Charleston. He became in turn a ship's steward, an innkeeper and again an actor. Eight years ago he succeeded to the title as third baron of a creation of 1859, but inherited very little money with the title. Recently Lord Lyveden has been associated with Dr. Lunn, who runs the tourist agency which owned the Argonaut.

Comedy in the Cholera Scare

The cholera scare has led to some comical situations at the Northern Railroad station in Paris, where travellers by the Nord Express from Russia are subjected to a rigorous disinfecting process. One elderly gentleman of a pronounced Slav type the other day watched with increasing ire the operations of the sanitary attendants, who soaked his clothes, shirts and collars with carbolic acid, but when they also gave a liberal douche of the same solution to a bagful of luscious pears he had bought on the journey his patience was exhausted. Seizing the bag he bombarded the disinfecting staff with the fruit, which was fully ripe, and his aim was true. He turned out to be a Russian general and a nobleman, but he had a good deal of trouble with the police after this feat. In Belgrade, Servia, a rag and bone man named Yotsa Swinar caused a commotion last week by rushing into the dining room of a hotel where wedding guests were assembled, and screaming "Cholera! Cholera!" He then fell writhing on the floor. The briday couple, followed by the guests, ran shrieking into the street and a crowd collected. When the police with two doctors arrived Swinar was found doing himself well on the abandoned victuals. He is now digesting them in prison.

Loie Fuller as a Spellbinder

Loie Fuller's book "Fifteen Years of My Life" is full of good anecdotes. One of them relates how she presented the Japanese author Kawakami to the French Society of Authors. To her surprise all the distinguished members were present and Sardou made a great speech, welcoming Kawakami, who did not understand a word of it. Loie translated the speech to him in English, which he did not understand either, but which pleased the French. Sardou then asked Kawakami to make a speech, which he did in Japanese. Then Sardou asked Loie to translate it. She did not understand a word that Kawakami had said, but felt that she must say something. So she arose and gave a pseudo translation in broken French,

Vegetarian vs. Meat Eater

A few days prior to the Marathon race an advocate of fruit diet, chiefly bananas, aged forty-three, offered to run a race with a flesh eater around the island of Zealand. Since the banana man has earned a good many triumphs as a runner in the sporting world of Denmark, the beef eaters did not show any burning zeal to accept the challenge till the well-known paper Politiken offered a prize of 100 kroner to the winner. A grocer's assistant, aged twenty-one, was selected as the upholder of beef eating and for two days and a half the runners kept abreast of one another. Then the banana man flagged, and when after nearly five days the young grocer arrived at Copenhagen, having duly finished his course, his opponent had vanished. The butchers of Zealand have presented a silver bowl to the victor, and are still celebrating their victory.

Brilliant Rise of a Fakir

With the fall of the old regime in Turkey Ab-ul Huda, the Sultan's astrological guide, philosopher and friend, has come to the end of his brilliant and lucrative career. He is now confined on the island of Prinkipo, in the Sea of Marmora, on a charge of high treason. An Arab by birth, Ab-ul-Huda's career has been remarkable. He came to Constantinople as a penniless youth and used to earn a few paras by telling fortunes at street corners. Then he made connections at the Palace, and one day was called to the Sultan. From that day his fortune was made, and for thirty years the crafty wizard enjoyed Abdul Hamid's implicit confidence. He gained a great reputation as an explainer of dreams, but it was chiefly as a magician that he commanded his august patron's faith. His magic appears to have been something like that of Mark Twain's Yankee at the court of King Arthur, for he kept up his game by the assistance of an accomplice, a pasha, now in disgrace abroad, who was in charge of the telegraph department at Yildiz Kiosk. This worthy used to send the astrologer advance information of all the telegrams received at the Palace from the provincial governors and military commanders, and the wily astrologer would report to Abdul Hamid what the stars had told him. Sevral hours later the telegrams would be delivered, and they backed up the stars every time. But now Ab-ul-Huda's reputation as well as his occupation is gone.

Novel Advertising Tricks

Parisians are being treated to a number of novel advertising tricks. One of them is the luminous hat. A row of solemn frock coated, top hatted men parade the boulevards at night. Each of them carries in his pocket a small battery connected with an electric light arrangement concealed in the top of the hat, which is made partly of transparent material. On pressing a knob a hatter's advertisement shines out resplendently around the crown. The other device calls for the intervention of the Society for the Suppression of Street Noises. For the first time parrots have been drafted wholesale into the advertising service in Paris. "Use X's mustard," one bird, a fine gray, yells incessantly. It appears that a parrot's academy exists somewhere in the suburbs, from which the above bird has been graduated with honors. The school is divided into classes and the birds are promoted according to their progress. In most cases it is pretty slow work and requires a good deal of patience.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC

By R. E. Mulcahy

The great political struggle has come and gone with the result perdicted; the good effect is being made evident in every quarter. Capital once more feels secure; confidence prevails in all lines of trade. Improvements which one week ago rested in the minds of those who had such matters in view are now on their way to realization. Bankers view the changed conditions with a feeling of the utmost confidence; this does not mean that all who want loans can be accommodated. Conditions in this respect have changed; more conservatism will be in order; those who have legitimate use for funds and who can properly protect their loans will have no trouble for the next four years to further their ideas, but wildcatting will find a cold shoulder in financial channels; the lesson taught in the past two years will be remembered for a long time to come. As predicted in these letters, Taft's election would be the signal for a big advance in the security markets of this country, has been fully verified. The stock market in general has experienced one of the greatest upward movements known to Wall Street. The Harriman stocks headed the procession, Southern Pacific common advancing to 119⅛, preferred to 121; Union Pacific common to 181⅞. The Hill stocks took on life and showed marked strength. The buying by foreigners was much in evidence. This will bring a great deal of gold to America to pay for our securities purchased. One noteworthy fact and one which means more than appears upon the surface is the low money rates prevailing up to the present; when compared with the past two years at the same period the contrast is a very great one. With cheap money stocks and bonds must and will sell higher. Everything now forecasts the retirement of Southern Pacific preferred, and the advance of its common stock dividend to a 7 per cent basis; this should advance price of the common stock to 150. The cheapest stock on the market at present is Atchison common, selling under par and paying 5 per cent. Atchison common has until recently sold higher than Southern Pacific common, and if it does not catch up to its old position again it will be surprising. The equipment stocks are rapidly being brought into the limelight again; these properties will experience great prosperity for a long time to come. Their securities will return good dividends to those who buy them around present prices. The Steel stocks have advanced materially. It is reported they have booked a larger tonnage than ever before, and that orders for immediate shipment are paying a premium over list prices. Orders for locomotives and cars are being placed in large quanities. The American Locomotive Works are now booked ahead for six months; the same may be said of all other manufactures of this character. The steel car plants are simply flooded with orders for steel cars. The American Car Foundry Company contemplates increasing its force one-third. Many of the equipment companies took advantage of the depression in material prices and put in a large amount of supplies and material at a very low cost. This will show itself in the earnings at no distant date. The immense improvements made during the past four years by many of the large railway systems are now being shown in their operating expenses. It would seem from a general standpoint that everything is going along upon a basis of general satisfaction in every department of commerce. We are surely starting upon the greatest period of prosperity our country has ever experienced and no section will profit greater than the Pacific Coast, the one virgin field of the United States.

Wasn't It Awful!

The army set is all wrought up, I hear, because of a pathetic incident. It is a wonder that the papers haven't had a "symposium" of society's opinions on the fearful thing. Not since a millionaire married his sister-in-law's ex-maid has anything so frightfully disturbing occurred to ruffle the feathers of the leaders. It all occurred at Paso Robles during the army maneuvers at Atascadero. A bunch of army people from the Monterey Presidio stayed at the hotel. One of the richest of the guests at this hotel is a lady who occupies four rooms. She is not in the habit of coming down to meals but has them served in her own room. She is a beauty who dresses divinely, and is called "The lady with the madonna face." But it was not this bewitching woman who caused the sensation, but her maid. Though the lady did not come to the dining-room at meal-times her maid did, and—fearful faux-pas of the head waiter—she sat at the same table with an official's wife. The latter stood the indignity, so the tale runs, for one dreadful day, but her nerves could not stand the shock and she packed her trunks and left the hotel. The maid who innocently troubled the sensitive army lady, it is said, is a very fine woman who has been more of a companion to her mistress than a maid.

A Love Chase

The friends of two dignified bachelor representatives of the Federal judiciary are wondering which Judge is destined to be snared first by Dan Cupid. At the hotel where they live a good deal of merriment has been provoked by the love chase in which the judges figure as fugitives. They are the coyest pair of bachelors that ever were seen, but the pursuit is hot and apparently Cupid will not be denied. I am told that it has reached the stage at which messages are sent by telephone to the court and intercepted by the baliff.

Mrs. Scott Assumes Leadership

Mrs. Henry T. Scott, thinking it about time for our provincial aristocracy to wake up has decided to ring the bell. She is going to take hold of things and shake them up a bit. Since the fire General Apathy has ruled over the smart set. Sporadic attempts have been made to put a little gayety into the life of our exclusives, and they have had a few rattling good routs but there has been no continuous performance. The factional feud that split commercial circles wide open was reflected in the drawing rooms of Burlingame where women have taken sides and indulged in stinging repartee, and as a consequence the atmosphere has been somewhat congealed. Ned. Greenway has tried in vain to soften asperities and maintain respect for the amenities. Even the amiable Ned himself has been drawn into the feud; refusing to exclude from his dances certain persons disliked by the mighty Spreckels and the mighty Phelan he has been censured by their clique and his dances have been pronounced degenerate. However, Ned finds that there has been no diminution of the demand for invitations. But Ned has been growing somewhat democratic of late. He has let down the bars, and thus he has followed the example of the leaders of New York society who argue that it is very snobbish to exclude people merely because they are not very rich or merely because they never had grandparents.

Heartburning predicted

Mrs. Scott will start the ball a-rolling at the St. Francis about December 3rd. During her recent visit to the East she studied up the latest wrinkles in big dances and brought back many pretty favors for her opening ball. She will doubtless round up for that occasion all the old-timers, and rumor says that she will spring one or two big surprises. Her friends say that she will introduce a great lion. That Mrs. Scott has plunged into the social whirl with a deal of energy is evident from the fact that even with preparations for the December ball on hand she is taking a lively interest in the new organization under the auspices of which some very exclusive balls are to be given after the Christmas holidays. And by the way, there is a great deal of curiosity respecting this organization, at the head of which are Mrs. Scott, Mrs. Mountford Wilson, Mrs. George Newhall and Mrs. Mayo Newhall. I heard one of the ladies make the prediction the other day that from this movement many heartburnings will result; for while each member is to be permitted to submit a certain number of names for the list from which invitations are to be issued, the eligibility of each person nominated will be voted on by the twenty-five arbiters. Considering the prevailing friction in society it is safe to predict that blackballs will be in great demand.

Alone at the Ball

In connection with aftermath gossip of the Greenway birthday dance at the Fairmont one hears the old lugubrious refrain—lamentable lack of men. And nothing makes Mr. Greenway so mad. He always affirms that he had all the men he wanted. The fact is, however, that one of the most popular girls had to sit out two or three dances. One very attractive maiden, a debutante of two or three seasons ago, almost found herself without an escort for supper. She was standing alone when the procession to the supper room started, when two men who knew her well enough to call her by her first name, rushed over to her. "Sad, isn't it," said one of them, "to be out four years." It was somewhat embarrasing for a minute, but the girl managed to smile, and she had a very happy time at the supper. She was the only girl who could boast more than one attendant.

The Dresses

One thing to be said about the ball is that it was the best dressed affair that has been pulled off in this city since the fire. It was the first occasion of a general display of gowns of the Directoire order. I heard one young woman remark that every costume was strictly up to date with the exception of Mrs. Alfred Tubbs's. While she wore a very stunning and handsome gown it was not of the latest design. Three very striking gowns were those worn by the Newhall girls—the latest creations from New York. Miss Margaret was in blue satin; Miss Elizabeth in pink satin with purple tulle sash; and Miss Marion was in green satin trimmed with silver and gauze net.

The Snub Courteous

A little bit of repartee on the side enlivened a Burlingame tea last week. The victor was a young woman whose grandparents did not shine in early California society, and the vanquished was a young chap whose family was "in it" in South Park days. The young chap is full of the pride of ancestry and more than once he has twitted the young woman on the lateness of the family arrival. Surveying her gown at the tea, he asked with a twinkle in his eye, "Is that your family clan plaid?"

"Family plaid!" she ejaculated; "why I'm shanty Irish."

He smiled and remarked that in his ancestry was considerable Scotch blood.

"Too bad," said the young woman, "that your family like mine didn't prefer to shine in the present generation."

The Archbishop Will Marry Them

Society is looking forward to the biggest event of the coming week, the marriage on Wednesday of Miss Constance de Young and Joseph Oliver Tobin. It will be celebrated at high noon at the Cathedral. The ceremony will be performed by the Archbishop and will be followed by a solemn nuptial mass. The bride's gown is truly wonderful. It was purchased in Paris, as were also the dresses of the bridal party. Miss Helen de Young, in a gown of white satin, will be maid of honor and the bridesmaids, Kathleen de Young, Frances Stewart, Genevieve Harvey and Rebecca Kruttschnitt will be dressed alike in white satin, with bodices the shade of American Beauty roses. The groomsmen will be Harry Simpkins, Edward Tobin, Charles de Young, Cyril Tobin, George Cameron and Baldwin Wood. Mr. and Mrs. Tobin will leave at once on a honeymoon trip, but will be back in time for Constance to be maid of honor at her sister's wedding.

Helen de Young's marriage will be a home affair, George Cameron not being a Catholic. Both young couples will afterwards settle in San Mateo.... Joseph Tobin has already secured the Robbins house and George Cameron has rented the Bonner cottage in El Cerrito Park. About four hundred have been invited to the church. The ceremony will be followed by a breakfast at the home of the bride, to which about one hundred and fifty have been bidden. The bride has been the recipient of some beautiful wedding presents, among the most noticeable being a magnificent silver punch bowl and a tray and tea service of a very elaborate and wonderful design.

Eleanor Jarboe Married

The news of the marriage of Mrs. Eleanor Jarboe to a distinguished Austrian diplomat has just reached San Francisco. At this writing society is in ignorance of the name of the groom. Mrs. Jarboe is well known here in the smart set, being a sister of Mrs. Joseph Sadoc Tobin. Her divorce from Paul Jarboe several years ago did not occasion much surprise. Young Jarboe inherited the physical features but none of the talents of his father. Though a lawyer he practiced most at lawn tennis and polo. Last summer it was thought that a reconciliation would be effected when the Jarboes were brought together at Burlingame at the bedside of their son, who was very ill. While the boy's life was in danger it was thought matters would be patched up, but he recovered and the breach widened again. Since then Mrs. Jarboe has been residing in the East, where, it is reported, her wedding was very quietly celebrated last week.

May Bring English Polo Players Here

Frank J. Mackey and his wife are riding with the hounds in England. They will sail for home the latter part of this month. Lady Hesketh's Lawyer

Ernest Bird of London was the guest of honor at the Fairmont last week at a large dinner party given by Colonel John C. Kirkpatrick, manager of the Palace Hotel Company and the Sharon estate. Mr. Bird is attorney for Lady Hesketh, who was Miss Sharon, and at present a large owner in the Sharon estate. It is in her interests that Mr. Bird is in the city. Among those present were Judge W. Engagements Rumored

Rumor is very busy these days with the activities of Cupid, and if it may be relied upon, it is likely that several interesting engagements are to be announced in a little while. There is one very attractive girl, a debutante of two seasons, whose parents have frowned on the suit of more than one young man, causing the impression to spread that a purely sentimental match was not desired. The young lady has taken matters into her own hands, I hear, and the news of the engagement is expected to be made public on her return to town. She is a pretty little brunette, the sister of a girl who made a romantic runaway match about a year ago. The happy fiance lives in Palo Alto. Then there is another little brunette maiden who is more fond of books and dogs than of dancing and high teas and amazes her friends by her familiarity with Voltaire. She returned recently from a visit to her married sister whose marriage to a railway magnate was celebrated last fall. She is said to be engaged to a man prominent in business circles.

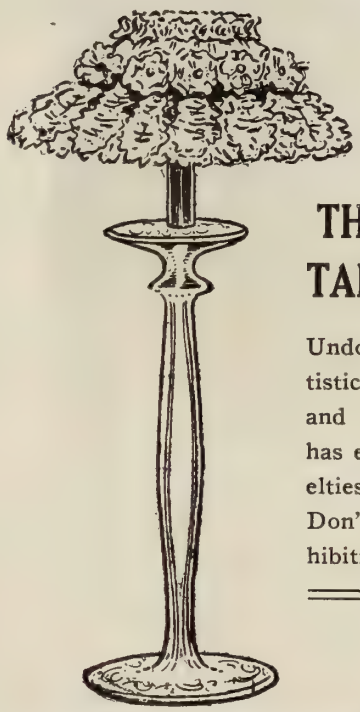
Berakfast of the Colonial Dames



The Colonial Dames of America gave their annual exclusive breakfast at the St. Francis on Saturday last, nearly all of the prominent members of the local organization being present. The California Society of Colonial Dames was the first to be organized outside of the thirteen original Colonial States. Mrs. Selden S. Wright, widow of the late eminent jurist, was appointed in 1895 by the national president, Mrs. Howard Townsend, of New York, to organize the society in California, and for twelve years she has been the president of the local branch. Eligibility to the Colonial Dames is derived from lineal descent from high officials who came to this country before 1750 and closes with the signers of the Declaration of Independence. The officers of the society are: President, Mrs. Selden S. Wright; Vice-President, Mrs. C. Elwood Brown and Mrs. I. Goddard Clark; Hon. Vice-President, Mrs. Charles H. Hedges; Correspondent Secretary, Mrs. Walter D. Mansfield; Treasurer, Mrs. George E. Whitney; Registrar, Mrs. John D. Tallant; Historian, Mrs. W. A. Brewer, and Genealogist, Miss Sarah Louis Kimball.

Preparing for Thanksgiving

Unless all signs fail Del Monte will be the scene of many jolly parties over the Thanksgiving week-end holidays. Many gayeties are planned by San Francisco society folk who will go down either by motor or train. The golf course is in excellent condition and as usual will attract a number of prominent business men who never miss an opportunity for a few days play on the famous course. The roads from this city to Del Monte are reported to be in good shape and should the favorable weather continue will tempt a large crowd of motorists. Besides the particularly elaborate Thanksgiving dinner which is always a feature at Del Monte Manager Warner is planning a number of other things which will add to the pleasure of his guests.

Troubles of an American Countess

That all the pretty American actresses who marry into the English nobility do not find their domestic way paved with bank notes and good intentions is illustrated in the experience of Anna Robinson, who became Georgiana Countess of Rosslyn. The Countess has just been ordered by the court to pay $560, the balance of a bill on thirty-two cases of wine which were ordered by her husband to celebrate their wedding in 1905. At that time they were living in Thurso Castle, Scotland. On the witness stand the actress-Countess stated that she had marked her entrance into the British nobility by paying many thousand dollars worth of her lordly husband's debts. She had likewise been obliged to furnish and stock the castle in order to make it habitable. "Besides all this," she explained to the judge, "I was called upon to settle a handsome sum on him for spending money. He often ran behind this allowance and then I was besieged by his creditors till I paid." It was on account of this increasing pestering of bill collectors that the Countess obtained a divorce during the following year. But the decree failed to save her from the Earl's creditors. As in the case of the wine bill at issue, they still pursued her under the plea that when his wife she had become personally responsible for his debts. In a way this was borne out by a remark she made to the Earl soon after they took up their residence in the castle. One day several cases of wine, ordered by her husband, arrived addressed to the Countess. "See," she said, "it is billed to me: your credit is no good." The Countess fought the case stoutly because she was opposed to paying all the Earl's back debts. The new Countess, his third wife, was in court an interesting spectator of the proceedings. In her turn she also was supporting the Earl.

Social Spotlight

Mr. and Mrs. Wellington Gregg and their attractive daughters, Misses Enid and Ethel, have returned to San Francisco after having spent the summer abroad. The Greggs have taken apartments for a time at the Fairmont Hotel and may decide to spend the winter in town.

The Henry F. Duttons have returned from Europe and are at the Fairmont.

Concealed behind the simple registration of Miss Krupp, Austria, is a very interesting personality of one of the near relatives of the famous house of Krupp, whose fame as gunmakers is world-wide. Miss Krupp, accompanied by Miss Maltzahn, is a guest at the Fairmont Hotel, having arrived in San Francisco from Alaska en route to Honolulu. The ladies are making a leisurely tour of the world, stopping at such places as strike their fancy. They have been four years on this part of their journey and expect to extend it for one or two years more. Miss Krupp is greatly pleased with San Francisco and the wonderful work of rebuilding.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Baldwin are at the Fairmont again after a long absence. Mrs. Baldwin's health has been such that she has been compelled to live in a warm climate the greater part of the time. Friends here are rejoicing that she is well enough to return once more.

Mrs. Phoebe A. Hearst, accompanied by her guest, Miss Conchita Sepulvida, o fMexico City. is at the Fairmont for a few days. Miss Sepulvida is the daughter of Judge Ignacio Sepulvida, who, with his wife, has been visiting at Mrs. Hearst's beautiful rancho near Pleasanton.

Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher Ryer and Miss Doris Ryer, who have been spending the summer at Del Monte, have come back to town and have taken apartments at the Fairmont for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Frances J. Carolan were dinner guests last week in London of Mr. Zimmerman, father of the Duchess of Manchester. Mr. Zimmermann has been engaged in trying to settle the debts of his noble son-in-law.

At a quiet but very pretty ceremony Tuesday evening, Miss Alice Rallee and Mr. Vere Ellenwood were married in the Hotel St. Francis.

A few of the recent arrivals at the Tavern of Tamalpais were: Hazel Baker, W. W. Russell and wife, Mrs. W. L. Carr, Mrs. W. E. Baker, David S. Zachman. Loyd Ackerman. H. J. Hatch and wife, Geo. R. After a brief honeymoon spent in the southern part of the State the happy couple will make their home with the parents of the bride, Mr. and Mrs. William Brown at 26 Fifth Avenue, this city.

Mrs. Walter Magee and her sister Miss Ethel Deane are at present visiting the Deane ranch in Nevada. Upon their return they will occupy an apartment in one of the Joliffe flats on Pine near Leavenworth Street. Mrs. Wentan and Mrs. Mills will occupy an apartment in the adjoining flat.

Miss Carrie Mills will return from her trip to Japan December 1st and join her mother and grandmother.

Miss Margaret Newhall was one of a merry house party last Saturday which Mrs. Mountford Wilson entertained at her home in Burlingame. Early Sunday morning the guests left for a thirty mile ride on horseback to Pescadero. Raymond Armsby, Athole McBean and Mountford Wilson were of the party. Miss Newhall is a graceful and fearless horsewoman.

Second-Lieut. Fred Stewart, son of Col. William Stewart, U. S. A., has been ordered to the Presidio. He will arrive here shortly. Lieut. Stewart recently passed his examination and has been assigned to the field artillery.

Invitations are out for the large ball Mrs. Joseph Donohoe will give to introduce her daughter to society. It will be a brilliant affair at the Fairmont on November 18th.

Mrs. Carrie Green Noble who went abroad to attend the wedding of her daughter, will return the latter part of this week. Mrs. Green and Miss Florine Green are at present occupying a house on Broadway.

George K. Hooper will soon leave on a business trip to New York. While there he will visit his sister, Mrs. Perry, wife of Captain Perry, U. S. A., stationed at Fort Totten, New York. Mrs. Perry was formerly pretty Mamie Hooper, daughter of the late Major W. B. Hooper.

Cards are out for a large luncheon to be given in honor of Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick by Mrs. James King Steele November 19th in the gray room of the Fairmont Hotel.

Victorien Sardou

The most successful dramatist of the age, Victorien Sardou, died in Paris this week. Though a member of the French Academy Sardou will never be assigned to a place among the geniuses of French literature; and yet for half a century he was recognized as the premier dramatist of France, the writer for whose plays there was always the greatest demand. His death was recorded in the despatches in less than a dozen lines. If his death had occurred twenty years ago no daily paper would have devoted less than a column to the story of his career. How the world does move! How far behind it left the author of La Tosca, Fedora, Diplomacy and Cleopatra! This was indeed a case of the man surviving his vogue. A quarter of a century ago the Sardou plays were being translated into all languages and very fortunate was the British or American manager who enjoyed the Frenchman's friendship. A remarkably prolific writer, Sardou kept Sara Bernhardt supplied with plays for more than a generation and there was never a night when it was not possible to witness a Sardou drama in Paris. With Dumas fils Sardou ruled the theatrical world of Paris when Henry Becque, the father of the latter-day movement in French dramatic literature walked the boulevards night and day with plays under his arm, and, as somebody has said, plays up his sleeve and plays in his hat—plays which nobody would produce. Becque persisted until he forced his way into the Comedie Francaise. It was through the influence of Sardou that he obtained a hearing, and singularly enough his rise marked the decline of the veteran. About that time the esthetes of Paris began to take an interest in the drama, and gradually they educated the public taste above what George Bernard Shaw has termed Sardoodledum. They scoffed at Sardou the carpenter, as they called him, and pointed out that he knew nothing of the subtleties of the literary art; the art which is too often a mere affectation, a mask to be thrown off when the curtain falls. And even the school of naturalism of which Zola was the apostle sneered at Sardou. Zola said that the Sardou plays were without literary distinction. "They have no life," he said, "only movement; they are polished, dovetailed, machine-made plays." The fact is that Sardou, though one of the greatest masters of the technique of the drama, was never able to conceal the means by which he achieved his effects, and for that reason his art was never of the highest quality. Nevertheless latter-day critics have been unjust in their animadversions on Sardou's plays, for while those plays can hardly be classed as dramatic literature, their author showed considerabl power in the creation of types; and moreover when the outer covering is torn from a Sardou drama; when the thousand adventitious details with which the theme has been elaborated are removed there always remains an idea and a thesis. The critics that decry Sardou should remember that the modern stage owes much to his genius. Every one of the successful dramatists of the day in Germany and this country is indebted to Sardou. Even Ibsen confessed that he profited from his study of the Frenchman's technique. The Sardou comedy "Les Pattes de Mouch," which is known in this country as "A Scrap of Paper," and which was first produced in Paris in 1861 is still regarded as a model of dramatic technique.

"The Chorus Lady"

At the Van Ness Theatre commencing Monday night for two weeks the attraction will be Rose Stahl in James Forbes' exceedingly popular comedy, "The Chorus Lady." When "The Chorus Lady" was brought out in New York under the Henry B. Harris management, it scored so heavily that it ran for an entire season on Broadway and this was followed by an all-summer engagement at Powers' Theatre, Chicago. So both the star and Mr. Forbes' comedy come to the Van Ness with a wonderful record of success to their credit. "The Chorus Lady" is in four acts and in spite of the title, which might suggest musical comedy, it is a finely conceived comedy with moments of seriousness that are most effective. The story is based upon certain momentous incidents in the life of Patricia O'Brien, who, as her father proudly declares, is a queen of burlesque. The first act shows her return home after an unprofitable tour with "The Moonlight Maids." As she expresses it, the manager got "chilblains in the box office and the show went on the pazazz." The second act showing the chorus dressing room of a metropolitan theatre, with a dozen young women preparing for an evening performance, is a big novelty and one of the most correct pictures of life behind the scenes that has ever been staged. Miss Stahl's supporting company is incidentally the same that helped make "The Chorus Lady" a success during the long runs in New York and Chicago. The cast includes Eva Dennison, Alice Leigh, Amy Lee, Madeline Travers, Amy Lesser, Jean French, Alice Chase, Annie Ives, Margaret Wheeler, Lavina Mason, Wilfred Lucas, Early R. Williams, Giles Shine and Thomas Maguire.

A Grand Farewell Testimonial to Blanche Arral

A number of prominent musical people and the Belgian and French consulates have asked Manager Greenbaum to arrange at least one evening concert as a testimonial to Blanche Arral, the charming Belgian singer who so easily captured the hearts of San Francisco musical folk at her orchestral concerts at the Van Ness. Mr. Greenbaum has accordingly arranged for one concert to be given with the assistance of Steindorff's splendid orchestra at Christian Science Hall next Thursday night, November 19th. Mme. Arral, deeply grateful for the many kindnesses she has received during her recent illness, promises a programme such as we have never yet heard in a single concert. The numbers in rehearsal and from which the final programme will be arranged include the rarely heard "Polonaise" from Verdi's "Jerusalem," the grand arias from Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," Maillart's "Le Dragon de Villars," the "Jewel Song" from "Faust," "Au Cour la Reine" from Massenet's "Manon," and by special request the "Polacca" from "Mignon" and selections from "Carmen." Besides these works with orchestra Mme. Arral will sing French, English and Russian songs with piano accompaniment. As visits of artists of the ability of Blanche Arral are rare, no lover of song can afford to miss this treat. Seats will be ready Monday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

The Greatest of "Thief" Plays

"Leah Kleschna," written by C. M. S. McLellan and revised for her own use by Mrs. Minnie Maddern Fiske, will be the Alcazar's magnet next week. It is a story of a girl thief's reformation through the power of forgiveness and love, and its dramatic intensity and vividness of characterization are remarkable. Although it did not introduce the "female delinquent" to the stage—that honor probably belongs to Dicken's graphic portrayal of Nancy Sikes—it is the best of all plays of its kind, and provided inspiration for those that came after it. Mrs. Fiske is primarily responsible for "Leah Kleschna" being available for stock company representation. If she had produced the play as it left the author's hand there would be no place for it in the Alcazar's list, because it was originally intended as a vehicle for a star, with all the other parts very much obscured. In her revision of the manuscript Mrs. Fiske unselfishly manipulated things so that her own importance in the cast was not out of proportion. Confident of her own artistic strength Mrs. Fiske did not fear that anyone else on the stage, however well equipped with opportunity, would outshine her, so she improved the general structure by building up the other roles, and thereby provided excellent material for "stock." In the Alcazar production Evelyn Vaughan will have the title part, and it goes without saying that her fine presence, pleasing voice, rare temperament and admirable technique will give it impressive interpretation. It is not a "gown" part, and the woman who plays it cannot depend upon aid from her dressmaker, but Miss Vaughan showed by her work in "Salomy Jane" that her artistry owes little or nothing to sartorial embellishment. Bertram Lytell will play the practical philanthropist who reforms the girl. The part was first played by John Mason. The Alcazar's young leading man is admirably fitted for it both physically and temperamentally. All the other characters will be in competent hands.

The Dutch Comedians

Kolb and Dill continue to maintain their record of crowded houses at the Princess Theatre. There has not been a single performance during their engagement when the theatre has not been taxed to its greatest capacity. In "Playing the Ponies" they have a vehicle which displays their talents to the utmost and enables them to present an entertainment which continually excites mirth and laughter. "Playing the Ponies" will remain the program this and next week. It is the best entertainment of its kind that has been given in this city in many moons and the deservedly popular stars are fortunate in having most excellent support. Particular kudos should be awarded to Maud Lambert and Billy S. Clifford, who could not possibly be improved upon in their respective roles.

De Gogorza's Farewell

The programme arranged for the farewell concert of Emilio De Gogorza, the great Spanish baritone at Christian Science Hall this Sunday afternoon the 15th is indeed a most alluring one and every music lover will find something on it to tempt him to this feast of melody. The first group will consist of "Plaisir d'Amour" by Martini, "Handel's 'Where'er You Walk' and "De Noirs Presentiment" by Gluck. Then comes a group of German works; "Feldeinsamkeit" by Brahms, "Lockruf" by A. Ruckauf and "Cecilia" by Richard Strauss. The third group includes "Au Claire de la Lune" by Lulli, "The Marriage of the Roses" by Caesar Franck and "Malgre Moi" by Pfeiffer. Two Spanish songs by Alvarez form the fourth group and the final set is composed entirely of songs in English. "The Pretty Creature" by Storace, "The Complacent Lover" by Horatio Parker, and by special request, "A Dream" by Brockway, "Sing Me a Song" by Sidney Homer and "Mother O'Mine." Manager Greenbaum has received so many requests for "La Roi di Lahore" that he has induced Mr. De Gogorza to promise it as an extra number. Mr. Henry C. Whittemore the splendid pianist will play a Schumann "Romanze," Godard's "En Route," Chopin's "Polonaise" and by request the Mendelssohn-Liszt "Auf Flugeln des Gesanges." Seats may be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s until 5 o'clock Saturday and Sunday after 10 A. M. at Christian Science Hall.

Corbett Coming to the American

One of the good things announced for the American Theatre next week is Mr. James J. Corbett under the management of H. H. Frazee, in his new venture, "Facing the Music," which is said to be a highly amusing comedy in three acts, with a part worthy of the best efforts of any legitimate comedian. Mr. Corbett has won serious attention as an actor since his starring tour in Bernard Shaw's "Cashel Byron's Profession," and his many friends will be pleased to see him in a new comedy role. Particular attention has been paid to the selection of the supporting company and scenic equipment, and a production complete in every detail is promised.

Adele Verne's Concerts

San Francisco music lovers will be out in force to welcome the return of that gifted young artiste Adele Verne, who has evidently captured the hearts of the music lovers of Boston and New York with as great ease as she did those in this vicinity. In Boston Phillip Hale wrote of Miss Verne "that she was well worth hearing again and again." Three recitals will be given in this city at Christian Science Hall, the dates being Sunday afternoon November 22nd, Thursday evening, November 26th and Saturday afternoon November 28th. This will be the first Saturday matinee concert under Mr. Greenbaum's direction since the disaster. It will give an opportunity for many students from near-by towns to hear Miss Verne. The opening programme is an unusually interesting one and includes Schumann's "Forest-Scenes." This work, which consists of nine episodes, has never been given in public in its entirety, although certain parts such as "The Prophet Bird" and "Farewell" have often appeared on concert programmes. Other important numbers will be Beethoven's Thirty-two Variations, two Scarlatti sonatas, a Brahm's Rhapsodie and half a dozen

Cunningham as a Star

The last performance of that furiously funny farce, "Glittering Gloria," will take place at the Valencia Theatre Saturday afternoon and evening, and on Sunday afternoon that sterling Irish actor and singer, Arthur Cunningham, will make his first appearance as a star in Joseph Murphy's ever popular play, "The Kerry Gow." There is no one on the American stage more suited to this style of work than Mr. Cunningham, and Mr. Murphy, who has come to San Francisco with his stage manager, W. T. Sheehan, to co-operate with Sedley Brown and see that the production is letter perfect, predicts a brilliant future for the San Francisco favorite. Mr. Murphy played Dan O'Hara for thirty-two consecutive years and he sees a most worthy successor in the big baritone. The story of "The Kerry Gow," which means "the village blacksmith," is founded on fact and tells of Dan O'Hara, the smith, in love with a girl who has another suitor, Valentine Hay. As it is a crime punishable by transportation or death to have pikes, formidable weapons, in one's possession, Hay causes several to be hidden in the blacksmith shop. Dan is arrested but escapes from prison, just at the same time as the real maker of the pikes confesses on his death bed to the conspiracy against O'Hara. Dan returns to his forge and shoes the horse which saves his sweetheart's home by winning a great race. By means of carrier pigeons Nora is informed of the result of the heats as the race is run and the play ends prettily and happily. Mr. Cunningham's songs will, of course, be a feature of "The Kerry Gow," and among his selections will be "Nora Acushla," "Molly Bawn," "An Irishman's Toast" and "A Minstrel Boy." The support will be the full strength of the Valencia stock company, the scenic effects and costumes will be correct to the country and time and, in short, nothing will be left undone to make the production a notable one. Incidental to the production of "The Kerry Gow" there will be some spirited Irish dancing by those Celtic terpsichorean favorites, Clara Coyne, Frances Doherty, Dan Cotter and John P. Kelleher.

MISS DOROTHY PASMORE

Orpheum Vaudeville

The program at the Orpheum next week will introduce a number of the very best and most novel acts in vaudeville. The headline attraction will be the Musical Blacksmiths, with Cass, William and Eva Staley. It is a clever combination of harmony and fun with mechanical and electrical transformation effects which are perplexing and ingenious. The stage represents at first a completely equipped blacksmith shop with Cass, William and Miss Staley in "smithy" clothes. After making xylo-phonic music out of all the different articles in the shop a quick change presents them in a well appointed drawing room in full evening dress. Welch, Mealy and Montrose will present a comedy act which is full of farcical fun and introduces the humorous side of the strife between the New York "Giants" and the Chicago "Cubs." Lew Hawkins, who by his grace, refinement and wit has won the title of the Chesterfield of Minstrelsy, will amuse with an entirely new lot of songs and stories. William Morrow, Verda Schellberg and their company will appear in a bright and characteristic little play of frontier life, entitled "Happy's Millions," which is a capital vehicle for the display of much original humor interspersed with catchy songs. Next week will be the last of Henry Horton & Co., the beautiful Hengler Sisters and Mr. and Mrs. Allison, "The Swede Girl and the Fellow Who Sings." The Millman Trio, of which Bird Millman is a dainty and thrilling feature, will also conclude their engagement with this program.

Limelight

"Paid in Full," following its run of over three hundred performances in New York City, will be seen at the Van Ness following the engagement of Rose Stahl. "Paid in Full" is given the credit of being one of the most successful dramas of the age.

Louis James will be here a few weeks hence with his very elaborate production of "Peer Gynt," in which he is said to have achieved the most substantial success of his brilliant career. The production is the one used by Richard Mansfield prior to his death and necessitates three immense railroad cars for its transportation across the country.

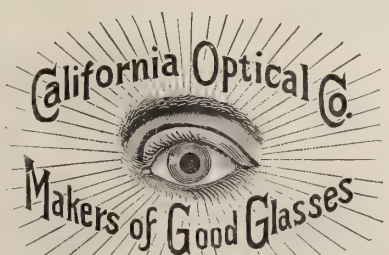
"The Point of Honor"



Joseph Conrad has written so many excellent stories of the sea that there was more than passing curiosity when it was announced that he was about to publish a military tale. "The Point of Honor" is its title, and it goes without saying that from this author nothing but the best can be expected. The narrative deals with two officers of cavalry in the army of Napoleon Bonaparte and of the series of duels, or perhaps it is best to call it one protracted duel, which was fought at intervals between them during all the period when Europe stood at bay before that conqueror. Both officers were at the beginning of hostilities lieutenants, and strangers to each other. Lieutenant Feraud had one morning fought a duel with a civilian, who, it chanced, belonged to a family of some importance in Strasburg. He had killed his man, and as far as he was concerned, that ended it. The family, however, were inclined to take a different view, and Lieutenant d'Hubert, of another regiment, on staff duty, was sent to order Feraud to keep his quarters under arrest. When d'Hubert arrived at the lodgings of Feraud he discovered that the latter was absent and learned that he was at the reception of a popular lady unknown to d'Hubert. He had no choice but to proceed at once on his errand and did so. Feraud, a Gascon of low birth, chose to feel himself affronted and, arrived at his quarters, demanded satisfaction. The situation was an absurd one, from which d'Hubert could not extricate himself and the duel was fought in the garden without seconds. Feraud was disabled in body, but his temper was aroused. Instead of being satisfied he was irritated. The cause of the difficulty was so trivial that d'Hubert withheld explanation, knowing that a plain statement of facts would not be believed. Feraud, given to bluster and bluff, preferred to keep silence also, but at the same to let it appear that some deadly insult had to be avenged. At times the two officers were widely separated in pursuit of their military callings, but always, sooner or later, they came together once more. Every time that d'Hubert received a promotion Feraud would take occasion to declare that he had schemed for the step in order to make the difference of rank an excuse for declining combat, and forthwith would bestir himself to gain an equal rank. Both marched to Moscow and both lived through the retreat, tramping together and even aiding each other in straits, but always with that absurd "point of honor" to be settled. The empire came to an end, Napoleon was banished, and the monarchy was restored, but still there lay the point of honor. D'Hubert, connected with the aristocracy, accepted the new regime, and used his influence secretly in favor of Feraud, but still to no purpose, for the latter discovered an entirely new grievance, and so it continued for more than fifteen years. D'Hubert, on the eve of marriage, had all but forgotten the affair when Feraud once more appeared on the scene demanding satisfaction. One may call the outcome tragedy or comedy, according as the whole narrative appeals to him. The grandfather of the author was a member of Napoleon's Grande Armee. "The Point of Honor" is published under the sponsorship of the McClure Company.

An Artistic Calendar

The "Cynic's Calendar" is becoming as much of an institution as the Ayers' and Hostetter's, whose yellow and green covers were familiar adornments to every farm kitchen for generations, and whose weather predictions and jokes were equally appreciated. The Cynic's Calendar has taken on proportions since its first appearance, and now boasts an astronomical attachment, while the distorted maxims have been changed from time to time and still further distorted. While some may consider it in the nature of a stale joke, it is well to remember that witticisms are always new to a new audience, and some of the skeletons which are doing duty in the latest numbers of the comic weeklies were well known to the ancient Greeks when they appeared in the appropriate costume of that day and generation. That the Calendar has struck a popular note is abundantly evident from the fact of its yearly appearance, and the 1908 edition, with all the old and some new features will make its own appeal. The attractive binding, in Japanese crape, is another sample of the artistic work of the Paul Elder Company.

"Two Gentlemen of Virginia" is a typical George Cary Eggleston novel, in that the plot is of small importance as compared with its background. The author is well aware of this fact, for he aims at nothing else than the depicting of the typical life of Virginia. Colonel Butler Shenstone, his nephew Phil, or Dr. Greg Tazewell might each pose for the portait of one of the gentlemen with equal success. The two younger men are rival suitors for the hand of the heroine, and their attitude towards each other is chivalrous in the extreme, while the position with respect to the elderly colonel is equally beyond criticism. Valorie Page, the heroine, is the subject of litigation. She is the ward of the younger Shenstone, having been bequeathed to his care by her dying father. As a child of six she had been kidnapped by her stepmother and educated with a view of making a public performer of her, an occupation which, in 1857, was far below the lowest round of the ladder of respectability. While hastening to take advantage of the first tidings of Page that had reached him in a decade, stating that the Mississippi pilot was killed in a steamboat disaster, Phil Shenstone was made guardian of a young lady whom he had never seen and of whose character he was in absolute ignorance. Nevertheless, he acted at once, removed her surreptitiously from the convent in New Orleans, and placed her in the care of his elderly uncle near Richmond. This gives the author his favorite background, and we are introduced at once to life on a well ordered plantation, where the master oversees his own fields and the mistress is indeed the housekeeper who not only orders, but instructs her black retainers in their duties, looks after their material comfort as well as their moral welfare and sees that all is done decently and in order. The litigation which is instituted by the stepmother, reputed mother, of the heroine, gives opportunity to contrast the methods of the Virginia judges and lawyers, giving heed to equity and justice and the meaning of laws, with those of the clever Northern importations whose object is to win cases for clients at any expense of technical or literal interpretation of the statutes. It may be assumed that all ends well, as it should. Taken in connection with other romances by the same author "Two Gentleman of Virginia" helps to round out a picture of life and society, which whatever its faults in actuality is one of the most agreeable to contemplate through the softened haze of restrospect. An Obsession of her face leaped up like life against the black, like the marbles of lacquer work. On her small lips, so smiling before, a very nest of caresses, and now cold. insensible as those of a marble statue, there was a slight pitiful curve. The closed eyelids shut out her glance from me forever. Then I do not remember anything more. Gusts of air entered and flickered the flame of the candles, causing yellow splendors to pass over the face of the dead. I hear wailing notes, organ notes ironically joyous, the buzzing of flies and the strokes of the succeeding hours. resounding abruptly, heavily, inexorably in the silence of the night; and many thoughts, a great whirling in my head of fancies and memories.

I relived the scenes and the caresses of these two years and I saw her, unvarying, impassive, sunken in the depths of her sleep of death; I took her cold hand, I called to her, unable to admit that she was dead. Dead—and why? What had she done, and what had we done? She remained impassive, and the serious look on her face told me all that separated us; she was very far away; for her I existed no more! The thought of the solitude of the following day, and the certainty of her death, made me crazy; I was desperate against my powerlessness and the fate that creates beings only to annihilate them so swiftly.

I thought of my fault, of my criminal pride. One movement, one word, one request would have sufficed and she would have been living, prodigal in her caresses, and murmuring in my ear her loving words. I turned to look at her—the same curves in her face. the eyes always closed, the large candles shedding luminous splendors upon her and yellowing the long strands of her loosened hair.

I repented, I loathed myself, but all in vain. Absolutely no power could give sweetness to her smiles or light to her eyes. Days would follow days, and I would await her in vain. The world would continue its usual course, nothing ould be changed, only she, she who ought to feel and move like the rest, would remain forever buried beneath the ground, and all through my silence. my pride. For me there was nothing but constant desolation. For her——

When I grew resigned to the inevitability of her death, and began my long lone journey, the sight of the objects that she had gathered together and lived familiarly with became frightful to me. Then began my long Via Crucis, in which I reconstructed detail by detail, the whole of my former happiness. Everything reminded me of her; I met her in everything, and all was still full of her presence.

Unable to fight against all this. I abandoned the house where we had known so many joys together, and where, alone, I had passed such bitter moments. Then began long tedious days of continuous wandering, fleeing from her memory like an ingrate; days in which I struggled against revisiting the reliquary wherein her memory is deposited and where her image floats. I came to the house, I saw the closed doors, the empty balconies, everything speaking of abandonment and death; and feeling myself weak, I went and drank, to drive away my sorrow. But the vision of her body as it fell into my arms, and that expression of loving reproach which came from her eyes as she retreated from life, the blood covering her, so tormented me that I suffered the most frightful grief.

After some time I returned, determined to work. I passed many days and many nights bent over the table, nervously filling page after page, endeavoring by my imagination and labor to draw myself out of my thoughts. Frequently the very words that I wrote touched and lacerated my wound; and at times, forgetting for a moment, I turned and sought for her at my side, as I had done when she used to sit by me at my work. Not finding her, I would hurl the pen away and sink again more deeply into my sorrow.

But it is here that the darkest part of my story begins, and fills me, always egotistical, more than the whole of this drama with grief. Do not smile!

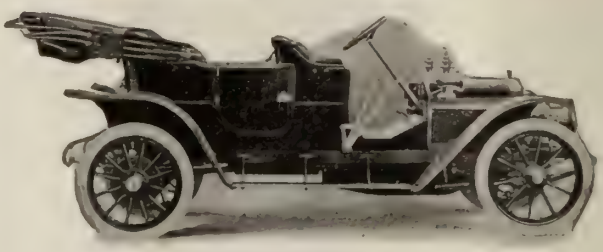
One night, after several hours of work, I felt a light noise behind me. I was nervous and turned abruptly. You will forgive my saying that I saw nobody. I continued working, somewhat troubled, and mistrusting the shadows that flocked outside the luminous radius of my lamp. In a little while I felt, or seemed to feel, a light touch on my shoulder; I sat frigid, remembering that she used to call me in this way when she wished to interrupt me in my work; and I experienced a horrible, anxious feeling. I did not dare to turn my face, I almost stopped breathing, dreading to find something behind me. After a moment of effort I at last turned my face, slowly, making a noise in my effort. Nothing—only the half shadows, and the gilded glittering of the picture frames. I took long breaths, feeling consoled; but still frightened, I let the pen fall, and without turning again, with a clamminess on my brow, I went straight to bed.

It is needless to say to you that I could not sleep. The least noise, the strokes of the hours, the creak of a piece of furniture, the scurry of a rat, all produced in me cold sweats and sudden starts, in spite of all my stern reasoning.

But since then, my friend, it is always the same; I start at every sound; I work always with my ear alert, anxious to catch each noise. In a word, I am afraid, afraid, of the poor suicide whom I loved so much. I am afraid that she may return; afraid, above all, of the expression in her last look, which I cannot, nor ever shall be able to forget. I am not mad, no, but I feel her wandering invisibly around me, and I am afraid, afraid of her.

I am afraid. yes, and of her. Come, come and free me from this terror, from this constant, insupportable anguish. Feeling someone at my side, I shall be strong. I have thought of marrying to bring to my side someone who would shield me from her, but no! She would be jealous, and I could never kiss my wife without feeling her coming invisibly between us two.

It is not that I have ceased to love her. No; I love her and I long for her, for my days would not be so black, were she at my side. But, you see, I loved her greatly; she loved me greatly; I was very happy, and now it is fated that I pay the price by this worst of punishments—fearing her, desiring to hide myself from her.



You see! Now, at this moment, as I write to you, the creaking sound of a door being moved inwards by the wind—is it by the wind?—has made me tremble and my brow is clammy, and I cannot, I dare not turn my face.

I am afraid! I am afraid! Come, my friend. come, or I do not know what will become of me!

Auto Notes

Fifty-three miles an hour is the record claimed by R. S. Cahen of this city with his 30 h. p. Chalmers-Detroit touring car. "I have a Stewart speedometer on my machine," said Cahen, "and just to see what the motor would develop, I turned it loose on the boulevard. We had five people in the car and the speed registed at the fifty-three mile an hour mark."

Charles H. Vescelius took delivery Thursday from the Howard Automobile Company of a two-cylinder Buick runabout in which he will immediately undertake a tour of the Sacramento Valley and the central part of the State. He will be accompanied by his wife, who has also acquired the art of handling the wheel.

Mr. C. E. Mathewson is in receipt of a wire from the Los Angeles branch of the Diamond Rubber Company stating that the Franklin car which finished second in the twenty-four hour race last Sunday made the entire 836 miles without a single change of tires, establishing a world's record for a twenty-four hour grind on a circular track, and as far as tire economy is concerned winning the event handily. These were the new Mountain Tread type of tires which the Diamond Rubber Company are selling this year at the price of the regular casing.

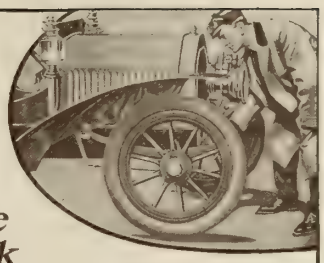
The Consolidated Motor Car Co. reports the sale of a '08 Franklin D surrey to the Spring Valley Water Co., which has used the Franklin machine before.

Coast Sales-manager C. A. Eastman of The White Company has returned from a whirlwind trip through the Northwest. During the ten days he was traveling in that territory he sold sixty-nine White steam cars and established five new agencies. The new agency at Walla Walla, Washington, will be held by the McBride Auto Company, which is building the finest garage ever erected in the "Inland Empire." Other agencies were established at Tacoma, Puyallup, Davenport, Wellington, and Cranbrook, British Columbia. The latter agency will sell cars for use in the mountainous Kootenai country, where the White steam car has already proven its worth.

Major Roosevelt, cousin of the President, took a motor car trip yesterday to the top of the famous Twin Peaks. The major was being given a demonstration in a Chalmers-Detroit car, when the hill climbing ability of the little thirty horse power car came up for discussion, and immediately the major wanted to be "shown." This the representative of the Pioneer Automobile Company proceeded to do, and putting on Wead chains, the car was sent to the extreme height of the famous old mountain. The major expressed himself as perfectly satisfied with the climbing power of the car.

Dr. Austin Clarke of Oakland reports that he has driven his 1907 Frankling G 16,000 miles at an average monthly cost of only $11. He has made the trip to Los Angeles and return several times, also to Lake Tahoe. Dr. Clarke was one of the first owners of automobiles in the State, having in his time had sixteen different makes. He states that the Franklin G is the only car he has ever owned that could do his work satisfactorily.

A. J. Mull. of Sacramento, has just completed a successful mountain trip with his seven passenger White steam car. With a full complement of passengers and a complete camping outfit. Mull penetrated the high Sierras of Northern California several weeks before hunting season closed. By reaching districts seldom invaded by the visiting hunters, the party succeeded in getting fine shooting. To reach the best hunting grounds, Mull was compelled to take his big White over what were formerly considered impossible roads for the automobile. One trip was made over a road which fololwed a stream bed up a canyon, and, while following it, several fords were made which threatened to submerge the car. But it was as a hill climber that the White proved its metal, making several ascents never attempted by the teamsters of the district. The only accident of the whole trip consisted of a blowout.



The local automobile dealers are enthusiastic over the victory of the American car in the Vanderbilt race. Regardless of the make of machines handled, the San Francisco agents have only the highest words of praise for the American drivers, the American car and the American tires that won the event. In discussing the race, E. P. Brinegar, of the Pioneer Automobile Company, local representatives of the Thomas cars, said: "The race proves beyond a doubt that America is in the lead in the manufacturing of motor cars. The fact that an American car has now won the Vanderbilt race proves that not only can we beat them at durability, but we have also passed them in making speed cars. As in the New York to Paris race, the foreign made cars were picked, even by a great many in America, to win the honors, but right from the start the Thomas assumed the lead, and from that time to the finish the facts are too well known in motor history to need repeating. I am certainly glad that we have at last convinced the American and foreign people that America leads in motor making, as in practically everything else. I congratulate the American winner."

W. M. Hale started Thursday morning for his home in Redding, Shasta County, in a Buick "White Streak" which he purchased from the Howard Automobile Company.

R. H. Clark of Detroit has been added to the selling force of The White Company. Mr. Clark comes with the reputation of being an efficient salesman. and he has already made friends among the automobile people by his genial personality.

Mr. G. A. Boyer of the Consolidated Motor Car Co. reports that the complete line of Franklin cars will arrive here about the 15th of this month.

The New Cliff House

NOT until the doors of the stately edifice shown above are thrown open to the public will San Francisco be herself again. Without a Cliff House San Francisco is like Venice without the Campanile. Work on the new building is now being rushed with all possible speed, and "Jack" Tait, manager of the Cliff House Company, promises that there will be a "grand opening" about the first of April. From the land side the new building will look very much like the predecessor of the Sutro castle, only one story appearing above the roadway. On the brow of the cliff the first story will extend twenty-eight feet below the roadway and on the level of the first floor there will be a promenade forty feet in width overlooking the breakers. The dining room will afford a fine view of the ocean. Mr. Tait intends to make the new Cliff House the scene of banquets and balls and to that end a special car service will be provided.

A Californian Thanksgiving

Governor Gillett in his Thanksgiving proclamation tells us that Californians are justly proud of this land of sunshine and plenty and that we have reason to be thankful for bountiful harvests and business prosperity, adding as a fitting corrollary of these blessings an injunction to those who enjoy them to be mindful of those who are less fortunate, the poor, the needy, the sick. The reminder is timely, but it would be easy to show that the necessity of ministering to the unfortunate might be reduced to an almost negligible duty, especially if everybody would give his neighbor a square deal. Sickness we can only alleviate, but poverty and absolute need we can abolish if we are earnestly desirous of doing so. A little more loving kindness, a little less selfishness, and the great good deed would be accomplished. Moreover, there would be little need of charity in relieving these conditions; all required is an effort by those who have the opportunity, to help the poor to help themselves. If, as the Governor says, we are living in a land of sunshine and plenty and have reason to be thankful for bountiful harvests and business prosperity, there should be abundance of rumunerative work for everybody who can work and is willing to work. Fortunately a day of thanksgiving in California is a day of alms-giving and charity only for the temporarily poor and needy; those who are compelled to receive this charity this year were giving charity last year and will be repaying next year what they are receiving today. In truth our thanksgivings are more nearly unanimous than they are anywhere in America, which is saying that our people are better off in every respect than are those of any other land on earth. For this general condition we ought to give thanks, rather than for the individual blessing which we enjoy. We are thankful because we feel that no Californian in health and willing to help himself to what the gods vouchsafe, need long withhold his meed of thanks at any season for every blessing he may deserve.

A Plea for Plainer Language

With the Monroe doctrine always in imminent peril on the Atlantic seaboard and our insular possessions in the Pacific constantly menaced by a subtle and uncertain purpose inspired by Japanese aggrandizement, Uncle Sam is between the devil and the deep sea as concerns the disposition of the only battle fleet owned by him. Slowly but surely that fleet, erstwhile so conspicuous on our Pacific horizon, is fading away—vanishing into the purple twilght that obscures the vague mystery of the vast region east of Suez, the funnel vapors of diminishing coal holes growing more indistinct as the squadrons edge farther and farther westward, until our bulwark, pride, hope and outward line of defense shall be utterly lost to our staring vision. Whereupon it occurs to our Board of Supervisors and our Branch of the Red Cross humbly to petition Him who holds our destiny in the hollow of His hand also to hold and retain the fleet in Pacific waters, and, presumably as much in the waters of San Francisco bay as may be compatible with the desire of the sailors to spend their money in this city. The Supervisors urge their petition on the ground that "our possessions in the Pacific and our Pacific coast cities will be exposed" if we don't have a fleet of battleships to protect them; and the Red Cross insists that the fleet should remain with us because "the best assurance of peace is to be prepared for war." No doubt these petitions will be granted. The fleet will immediately return to San Francisco. We think we see it coming back. Sail ho! What ships are those? The American battle fleet, fair sir. Praise Roosevelt, we are saved. Glory to Him in the highest office in the gift of the people! But why are the Supervisors and the Red Cross not more candid and explicit in their reasons for retaining the fleet in the vicinity of San Francisco? If they are not seeking to absorb the contents of the paymasters' chests in the interest of local retail trade, why do they not say out and out that they are afraid Japan will declare war upon us? that Japan will not only take the Philippines and Hawaii from us but will invade the Pacific coast and put every mother's son of an American to the sword of the samurai? Why don't these timorous town dads and these fearful hospitallers whose organized purpose is to alleviate the horrors of war after it has begun and not before the first shot is fired, why, we say, do not these prophetic folk explain more in detail why they want the fleet to stay here? Cassandra Hobson doesn't speak in such riddle. Then why set up a Delphic oracle in our midst to deliver prophecies that speak both ways against the middle and four ways from the jack? Out upon such timidity! We are afraid of the Japs, and that's what's the matter with Hannah and all the rest of us. But why should we be afraid of the Japs? Since what time has our boast that we could whip our weight in a world of bobcats "been heard to cease?" Suppose Japan does declare a war on us—what then? What's to prevent us, immediately after the declaration, from going leisurely over to Japan and annexing the whole blooming outfit, as we virtually did in 1854 or thereabouts? Who's afraid of Japan? Why, if it comes to that, Japan be ——— pardon, honorable gentleman, we didn't know there was a samurai spy nearer than Van Ness avenue.

The Democracy and Its Future

A contemporary asks: Can the Democratic party as at present constituted stand this quadriennial pulverization at the polls much longer? The Democratic party has stood a great deal of pulverization and it has had worse beatings than the one from which it is now suffering. Much worse than any of Bryan's defeats was that of Horace Greely in 1872, and yet subsequently Tilden almost reached the White House, and Cleveland served two terms therein. The worst beaten candidate since Greely was Judge Parker, but the Democratic party showed no signs of disintegration after the campaign of 1904. Indeed it never had a better opportunity for success than it had this year when it threw away its chances by nominating the impossible Bryan for the third time. That the Democratic party is still to be reckoned with is evident from the strength it exhibited at the late election in those Northern States where Democratic governors and congressmen were elected notwithstanding the tremendous vote cast for the Republican electors. The Democracy will recover from the long spell of enervation from which it has suffered and again enjoy the sunshine as soon as it makes up its mind to take heed of the lesson that was taught at the polls three weeks ago. By this time the leaders of the Democracy must be sensible of the fact that conservatism is more popular than any of the by-products of Socialism. Three times the Democratic party was defeated through fear of the consequences that might flow from the bizarre policies of a standard bearer without principles or convictions whose platform was the vagaries and delusions of the hour. Surely it is clear to every man with an ounce of gray matter that even those people who are supposed to be discontented are not in favor of flying to ills they know not of. Perhaps there was never a time in the history of the Republican party when so many people were eager to rebuke the leaders of that party as there were this year, and yet they would not gratify the spirit of resentment at so great a price as, in their opinion, the election of the Nebraska demagogue entailed. So clear is the lesson that has been taught that it cannot fail to be apprehended, and there is therefore much reason for expecting a reorganization of the Democracy on the lines prescribed by fundamental principles. The Democratic party must and doubtless will cease to be the refuge of those who have failed in the struggle for existence. It must and doubtless will cease to promise a royal road for the unfit and for all that have been born tired. To realize its ambition it must demand that its leaders shall embody the national sense of unity based upon peace, industry and the love of our country.

The Shooting of Heney

The most shocking and lamentable of the many startling occurrences that have marked the progress of the graft prosecution was the murderous assault on Francis J. Heney, which threw the community into a panicky condition last week. At the first news of the crime the community was appalled; and mingled with sentiments of sympathy and solicitude for the wounded man were expressions of furious indignation. It was assumed that Mr. Heney was the victim of the ferocious resentment of the enemies he has made in the capacity of prosecuting attorney, and public feeling was greatly intensified when the cold-blooded and deliberate character of the crime was made known. Nothing is more terrible or more pathetic than the fate of a man who is cut off in the prime of life and plenitude of his powers by the hand of an assassin. Such was believed to be Heney's fate, and consequently the crime excited the horror as well as the tender emotions of the whole community. And if it had developed, as at first suggested, that the crime was the result of an atrocious conspiracy of unnatural monsters and bloody exterminators the explosion of public feeling would have been tremendous, but when it became known that Heney's assailant was Morris Haas, a man who had been brooding on what he conceived to be a grievance, with brow knitted for revenge and face black with settled hate, calmer judgment concluded that the crime was self instigated. Though this judgment was in a measure verified by the suicide of the prisoner, it is by no means concurred in by those who were first to charge a conspiracy, and who in the meantime called a mass meeting at which there was considerable perfervid oratory and some denunciation of Town Talk and other journals that have not approved everything that has been done in the name of justice and that are accused, though not specifically, of misrepresentation. Since the death of Haas there has been no abatement of effort to obtain evidence of a conspiracy but if anything tangible has been discovered it has not been made public. What developments may be expected in these parlous and singularly queer times is a matter of which we are not sufficiently informed to speculate thereon intelligently. We are sitting through a stirring and thrilling drama and we have not the slightest intimation of what is to come. These are days in which we not only sup full of sensations but breakfast and dine on them also. We are positive of nothing save that by reason of the shooting new vigor has been infused into the Ruef prosecution and that the conviction of that rogue seems more certain than ever. From the sentiment expressed by that hysterical sheet, the Boughten Bulletin, that the shooting of Heney was the culmination of the breakdown of law in California, we dissent. The law has not broken down in California since 1856 when all the machinery of government in this city was in the hands of corrupt politicians. If the law were to break down now the responsibility would be on the men in office who are reputed to be the foes of corrupt politicians. We do not believe the law will break down, nor do we believe that any of our cherished institutions, not even the liberty of the press, will suffer at the hands of the citizens of this city. We even believe there is sufficient manhood in this city to resent the efforts that are being made to silence the press with the weapons of calumny and personal abuse.

Japan's Complaisance

A correspondent of the Associated Press in Tokio announces that he has excellent grounds for believing that the situation in China, in the event of the Dowager Empress' death, will not be made the occasion of any summary move on the part of Japan, but that the Japanese government will await an agreement of all the powers. This semi-official assurance from the Japanese chancellery provokes a long, deep sigh of relief from the waiting nations who were fearful that in the event of the Dowager's death and an effort on the part of the real Chinese to wrest the sovereignty and government from the usurping Manchus, the Japanese would adopt the American precedent of occupying the disturbed empire and dictating its domestic policy. It is a great relief to know that Japan will wait until the powers have agreed on their several "spheres of influence" in a country that does not belong to any one of them and wherein they have no more right of jurisdiction except that which is conferred by their gunboats, than they have in each other's territory. Aside from their pride and their extreme sensitiveness to infringements upon their own rights and privileges, the Japanese are, nationally and personally, a very polite people. They are the Alphonses and Gastons of the Far East. "After you, gentlemen," they say; "choose your slice of the roast and then we will take our hunk."

Great Britain may retain Hongkong and a full partnership in the trade of the Yangtsze valley; France may hold what she has seized in South China with another strip to protect her Tonquin and Cochin-China frontiers; Portugal may continue to occupy Macao; Germany may keep Kiao-chau and she may enlarge her "concessions" in Shan-tung and Chihli; and America may have an "open door" anywhere that will not interfere with the monopoly of trade of the others. As for Japan, after the powers have thus parcelled the Middle Kingdom among themselves, all that is left will be hers in suzerainty similar to that which is now exercised over Korea, with absolute sovereignty of course over the three provinces of Manchuria and permanent possession of Port Arthur and the hinterland of the Liao-tung peninsula. Could anything be more generous than Japan's attitude in this matter? "I want you to know, honorable sirs," she says; "that I concede everything—on condition, of course, that you will do unto me as I propose to do unto you; it is your own Christian Golden Rule and you ought to be duly grateful to me, a rank Shintoist and a confirmed Buddhist, that I grant you so much when I might take it all, or most of it at any rate." The only bug in Japan's diplomatic paste pot is the Russian cockroach. No provision has been made, as yet, for Russian aggrandizement, and it has not yet been decided by the Japanese cabinet whether they can afford to let Russia have part of Mongolia and Thibet. After all the rest have been served the Russian guest at this Chinese feast may be asked if he would prefer a piece of the dark meat or a drumstick. Indeed there is a very general opinion prevalent in Japan that Russia will be a sort of Lazarus waiting at the back door for the leavings from the rich man's table.

Another Great Triumph

Said the Examiner the morning after the bond election: "Yesterday's fight for freedom from the clutches of Spring Valley was won against the determined opposition, not only of the water combine itself, but of the allied money powers, mercantile, financial and industrial"; also, "The property owners who sought to avoid an additional taxation of their holding opposed the Hetch-Hetchy project with might and main." If the property owners of the city together with the allied representatives of the mercantile, financial and industrial interests were opposed to the project by whom was it carried? The answer is to be found in the Chronicle of the morning after the election. According to that veracious journal, which advocated the Hetch-Hetchy project, it was supported in the Alms House precinct by two hundred and fifty-seven votes and opposed by only nine. Thus we have the story in a nutshell: wherever intelligence and zeal for the civic welfare prevailed the proposition received an overwhelming vote; it was opposed principally by ignorant property owners and by the benighted of commerce who are laboring under the delusion that it is to their interest to retard the progress of the city Doubtless among those who voted for the proposition were many who were inspired with rage against that most disliked of public service corporations, the Spring Valley Water Company—the original octopus—which has been practicing the gentle art of making enemies for more than a quarter of a century, and which naively titillated the emotions of the people the day before the election by raising the price of their bills. The notion is widespread that this corporation is to be crushed, its business destroyed and its property confiscated, and the supposition is that all this is to be accomplished by furthering the ends of the men behind the Hetch-Hetchy project, all of whom are believed to be philanthropists and some of whom are so modest that they are studiously keeping in the background. But the people are not likely to have their revenge on the octopus. Some day they will buy the Spring Valley plant and they will pay all it is worth —if not more. The law will protect vested interests and the politicians will not neglect their own opportunities. As for the taxpayers, they will have their taxes raised; and the burden as usual will not fall upon the Phelans of the town but on the small property owners and on the poor ratepayers who have no property, for of course the landlords will raise rents to meet the raise of taxes. To be sure we shall have water from the eternal snows of the Sierras, but somewhat impaired in transit. Water from the Sierras will not drive the iceman out of business.

A Literary Puzzle

A curious phenomenon is visible in the magazine literature of the hour. If you will take the trouble to note the authorship of the fiction now in process of publication you will find that almost all of it is the work of persons whose names are not generally known to the magazine-reading public. Some of this short-story work is excellent; much of it is above the average of magazine fiction; very little of it is mediocre; none of it is entirely bad. But the writers are strangers to the reader, and few of them repeat their performances however excellent may be their solitary success. Where do these literary meters come from; and where do they go? No doubt most of them are well known in the parishes where they live; a writing person who is able to "get into the magazines" even once is not permitted to hide his light under the village bushel; he has his following of "admirers" who honestly and faithfully believe that he is destined to achieve great things in the literary world; but the fact remains that the name which blazoned on the title-page of a monthly last January or flared from the headlines of a literary weekly last March has disappeared—apparently permanently. What has become of this apparition? One explanation is as curious as the phenomenon. It is the custom of many magazines to buy a good manuscript on sight and print it when convenient. Sometimes the editor pay on "acceptance"; and sometimes he pays on publication; it all depends on the editorial system; and in the majority of cases it doesn't matter to the accepted amateur when he gets his check; it is glory sufficient for him that he is in the pigeon-hole of acceptances. In consequence of this practice hundreds of manuscripts accumulate in the offices of the magazines and are kept from publication by "press" of more timely matter or the inrush of writers whose names are worth money in themselves—names that cost the publishers ten times the amount paid for the unknowns. This was the condition at the literary centers three months ago when the financial stringency began to make itself felt in every department of commerce. The publishers were among the first to suffer. Their sales fell off on the news stands; their advertisers either withdrew or cut their advertising expenses to the bone—there was a genuine panic in the magazine and periodical world, and but one ready resource. The publishers could not afford to buy "new stuff," so they began the publication of the contents of their pigeon holes. This, it is said, is what is now appearing in most of the magazines and literary weeklies of the Eastern States. The explanation, however, does not explain why the writers of such good stories as have been rescued from the dust and semi-oblivion of the pigeon-holes have not, as a rule, repeated their achievement. Even the prize-winners of a great weekly whose editorial staff has pronounced upon more than one hundred "best" stories offered in monthly and quarterly competitions, have seemingly exhausted themselves in that one mighty effort. Perhaps the most reasonable explanation is in the multitude of new writers that are swarming upon the literary publications. There is not a city, town or village in the United States that is without its budding literary celebrity. These legions of writers are storming the literary citadels day and night. They have not captured the citadels but they have overwhelmed the garrisons. They have embarrassed the editors with their riches. Only the best can be chosen from the vast competition; and this "best" is so frequent that there is no chance for a second best by the same writer, and it is so seldom that a writer produces anything better than his original best that he is constantly in competition with new writers who are better in their first presentation than he is in his second effort. Which reduces the proposition to one in which the lottery element is dominant: A good short story is always saleable and in demand; it is possible to write one good short story; but it is almost impossible to write another story as good as somebody else's best short story. If this explanation is not satisfactory we shall have to look to the publishers for a solution of the problem.

A Joy from Littte Things

By Fannie Stearns Davis

To press a joy from little things—
From feet that fall in time,
From daylong silent fashionings
Of some heart-ridden rhyme;

From shapes of leaves and clouds and snow,
From others' brighter eyes,
From thinking "I am dull, I know,
But some are glad and wise"—

From love remembered, tho too dim
For laughter or for tears,
One fragile flame, so pale and slim,
To gleam on grayer years—

That is one way of Joy, I know,
Yet I desire, desire,
To go the way a god might go Through Love and Life and Fire!

Science Behind the Gun

Some Technical and Explanatory Remarks Concerning the Proposed Excursion Into the Big Game Region of the Darkest Continent and Including a Candid Opinion of the Distinguished Anti-Nature-Faking Savant of the White House Commanding the Expedition

By Democritus

Interest in the Roosevelt African Scientific Exploration Expedition is greatly enhanced among Californian scientists, explorers, Lincoln-Roosevelt leaguers, original Taft men and Afrikanders, by the unexpected announcement that Professor Edmund Heller, a young and rising naturalist of the California State University, has been invited to participate in the excursion. It is almost needless to add that the invitation has been eagerly accepted with thanks, not only by Professor Heller but by the Board of Regents of the university who have suddenly manifested their appreciation of the young scientist's services and ability, hitherto hidden under a bushel of appointments proposed by the supreme arbiter of university affairs, by making him "curator of mammals" in the museum department of "vertebrate zoology." There is a salary attached to the position which will enable Professor Heller to pay his personal expenses while classifying the big game as it shall be slaughtered by the Great Hunter.

No naturalist is born great; some naturalists achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them. Curator Heller has had greatness thrust upon him and with this splendid uplift he will unquestionably achieve more greatness. Explorer Roosevelt will need some one to curate his own museum of big game vertebrates, and if Young Heller pleases the Big One, he may get the job, or he may be cast into the inner darkness of the Smithsonian Institute where vertebrate scientists browse obscurely with the extinct megatherium, and roam peacefully in fossil forests of the Devonian period with the post-tertiary sabre-tooth cat recently exhumed from a pre-pleistocene bog of inspissated bitumen in Southern California by Professor Merriam. Fierce is the light that beats upon all things Rooseveltian, and the reflected glory thereof is as one of the Rev. Tom B. Gregory's indescribable "vermilion sunsets." As long as Curator Heller basks in the favor of Explorer Roosevelt he will be like a full moon illumining the great desert of Roba el-Khali on a cloudless Arabian night; but let him beware of the Smithsonian eclipse that shall darken his fame with the fat shadow of a salary and a life-long association with the vertebrates and fossils of a bygone age!

Notwithstanding the perils that environ the aspiring young naturalist who is called to such close contact with the sworn foe of nature fakers, we must admit that we feel highly honored by the selection of a Californian to accompany this important expedition. This honor is the more highly appreciated because there are many zoologists and all-round naturalists in Africa who would have been glad of the opportunity to skin, stuff and classify all the animals that will fall before the unerring rifle and the trusty hunting knife of our Mighty Hunter. It is even possible that Professer Sclater himself might have been induced to curate the trophies of this Cape to Cairo chase. Professor Sclater is Director of the South African Museum and is intimately familiar with all the fauna of the Dark Continent. Moreover he knows the favorite haunt of every mammal from Mozambique to Morocco and from the Gulf of Guinea to the Red Sea—the baboon (Papio porcarius) and the black-faced Cercopithecus speak to Professor Sclater in the Garnett dialect; he knows the real African lion (Felis leo) when he roars; the leopard (Felis pardus) is for him no longer a mysterious prowler in the mountains behind Stellenbosch; and especially well informed is Professor Sclater concerning the habits of the African bobcat, called in that country the tijger-bosch-kat (Felis serval). As an authority on African cats Professor Sclater is believed to be almost as great as President Roosevelt on the American bobcat, and this special knowledge may commend the African naturalist so highly to the Great Explorer that he will be asked to join the Expedition notwithstanding the presence of Professor Heller.

The big game of Africa, otherwise designated the mammalian vertebrate fauna is quite extensive. Besides the baboons, lions, leopards and bobcats aforementioned there are two kinds of hyenas, the brown (Hyanea brunea) and the spotted (H: crocuta); the giraffe (Giraffa capenis) whose legs are polka-dotted and whose body is splotched; the hippopotamus of the Zambesi and Zululand; the boschvark (Potamochoerus choeropotamus) or wild hog of Natal; the wart hog (Phacochoerus aethiopicus) with tusks twelve inches long; the Burchell zebra, ranging from the Orange river colony northward to Masailand in East Africa; the white, square-lipped, one-horned rhinoceros (R. simus) and the black rhinoceros with a pout and a small probocis, ranging from the upper Nile through Somaliland southward; elephants, of course; hedgehogs, scaly anteaters, aard-varks (Orycteropus afer), aard wolves (Proteles cristasus), horseshoe and slit-faced bats, elephant shrews, civets, genets, mongooses, meerkats and such small deer; and about 150 species of antelopes including the hartebeest, the black wildebeest, the blue wildebeest, the bontebok, the blesok, the grysbok, the springbok, the blaaubok, the bushbuck, the gemsbok, the waterbuck, the pallah, the inyala, the kudu, the puku and the eland.

These animals are all in the books; some of them are almost extinct, having been hunted to the verge of extermination by mighty hunters before Roosevelt; most of them have been skinned, stuffed and classified and are on exhibition in all well-stocked museums everywhere in the civilized world; and the scientists know them by their Latin names as the native Africans know them by their aliases. When President Roosevelt reaches Africa with his scientific exploration expedition he will probably find that the big game world he expects to invade has been pretty well conquered not only by scientific gents but by the mighty hunters who have preceded him from the time when Hiram was king of Tyre down to the memorable date when Cecil Rhodes shot the last rhinoceros in Mashonaland in 1895. This will reduce the enterprise to a mere hunting trip; but the quarry bagged by the hunters will be known as the Roosevelt collection and will, as such, have to be skinned, stuffed, classified, tucketed and curated with as much care and as much scientific accuracy as to Latin and vulgar designation of species and genera, as if it were to be mounted in the great zoological museums of London, Paris and Berlin. If anything new is bagged it will be promptly Latinized into a Roosevelt species, and if anything is killed that

Important Factors in San Francisco's Commercial Future

By Charles H. Preston

When the long-predicted and now seemingly impending struggle for "the mastery of the commerce of the Pacific" shall begin to assume definite proportions, San Francisco will be the center around which the tremendous fight for supremacy will revolve. Here will concentrate all the forces that are gathering for the great battle that is to be fought in the near future to determine whether the vast profits of the rapidly developing trade of the Orient shall enrich the mercantile and industrial enterprises of America or serve to create a partnership monopoly for the traders and shippers of Great Britain, Germany and Japan. Already the aggressive and progressive commercial adventurers of Japan are seeking to forestall American enterprise in this direction by the establishment and operation of government-subsidized steamship lines on the Pacific, not only between the ports of Asia and this country, but throughout all the seas of the Far East and over the routes to Europe that traverse the Suez Canal and the Mediterranean. This sudden activity is largely incited by a knowledge of the probable consequences resulting from the completion of the Panama Canal.

San Francisco will be the vortex of this great movement, and it is highly gratifying to local pride as well as a substantial encouragement to local enterprise to know that we shall be fully prepared for the inevitable emergency. The harbor of San Francisco is the safest, the most commodious and the most convenient for its commerce in the world. In addition to its natural advantages it possesses at this time docking facilities ample enough to accommodate the largest ships afloat on these waters and active preparations are underway to increase this accommodation. At the present time the government dry docks at Mare Island and those operated by the San Francisco Dry Dock Company at Hunter's Point on the west bay shore are provided with every facility for handling any work that may be demanded by the shipping interests of the Pacific, as was fully demonstrated when the big battleships Connecticut and New York were overhauled and repaired in these great artificial basins. In addition to these docks, the government has made appropriation for the construction of transport docks and warehouses at Fort Mason on the south shore of the bay between the northern end of Van Ness avenue and Black Point.

Intimately connected with enterprises of this character are those planned by Charles M. Schwab, who recently purchased the Hunter's Point dry docks which are to be operated in connection with the Union Iron Works plant; and the intention announced by Mr. Schwab to enlarge the capacity of the ship-building department of the works by the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars, is a substantial guarantee of the firm faith of capitalists of the Eastern States in the commercial, industrial and financial future of this city. The Union Iron Works is destined to be a very important factor in the struggle for commercial supremacy on the Pacific Ocean. As the demands of this commerce increase the facilities of the shops will be enlarged to meet the requirements and there will be no lack of capital to maintain the prestige of this enterprise or to provide the material for aggressive action in the great struggle now impending on the Pacific Coast.

THE BIG BATTLESHIP CONNECTICUT

In the dry dock at Hunter's Point. This dock has facilities for handling the largest vessels afloat.

HUNTER'S POINT DRY DOCKS, Nos. 1 AND 2.

The vessels undergoing repairs are the Battleship New York and the Pacific Mail steamer City of Sydney

The Union Iron Works may be regarded as the arsenal wherein will be forged puissant weapons to be used not only for defense but also for attack.

Another great enterprise involving the use of San Francisco's waterfront as a point of departure for the commercial future of the city is the culmination of a project long contemplated by Mr. Herbert Law, whose personal interest in the welfare of the community is so manifest in his widespread and heavily financed property investments. Mr. Law, in association with the Vanderbilts, is planning for the improvement of the shore line realty of the Fair estate on the North Beach. This broad stretch of tide land, much of which has already been reclaimed, is to be utilized for docks and warehouses. The significance of this intention is enhanced by the circumstance that the Harriman belt line of the waterfront railway now operating in the direction of Fort Mason, and to be utilized as a carrier for supplies and material for the government work at that point, will eventually and naturally make a terminus here. Thus ship and car will be brought together within the corporate boundaries of the city. Deep sea traffic will be transferred directly to the freight carrying trains of transcontinental railroads. Thus we can infer, without assuming to know the full intention of those concerned, that some of the most potent financial and transportation interests in the United States are in combination for the furtherance of San Francisco's future prosperity. The Vanderbilts represent the New York Central and Harriman is the controlling spirit of the Southern Pacific and its continental congeries of railroads, an alliance in this regard that insures unlimited possibilities of improvement and traffic along the northern shore of the peninsula, one of which would almost certainly be the operation of another ferry service across the bay channel to the Marin County shore, thus bringing that populous section into closer contact with the metropolis.

These are but the beginnings of enterprises that will prepare this city to take its place among the capitals of the world, a splendid future metropolis on the globe-encircling highway of traffic—a strongly entrenched citadel of commerce commanding the gateway of the Western ocean for the maintenance of American supremacy in the coming struggle for "the mastery of the Pacific."

The Wooden Sabots---A Lover of the Queen

(Translated from the French of Aime Giron by Ballard Craig.)

General Gilbert de Motier, Marquis de La Fayette, possessed at Auvergne his old family chateau, Chavaniac—a huge, strongly built, clumsy, and characterless pile. Not far away rose rugged cliffs, covered by a tall growth of chestnuts and beeches. Beneath the green night of these forests swarmed the toilers of the wood. Dwelling in huts, working side by side in the open air, were the charcoal makers, the resin workers, the plank sawyers, the stave cutters, the makers of sabots.

Among them was a young sabot maker who neither sang nor worked with the rest. He was an orphan and a dreamer, reserved and taciturn. Apart from the others, he silently cut, shaped, pointed and polished his sabots. His name was Razon, signifying, in patois, Reason; but as he had such strange ways, lived alone and spoke little, the peasants gave him the nickname of Darazon, or "The Simpleton." And when, after awhile, it was discovered that beneath a rusty old musket on the wall of Darazon's hut there was pinned a tiny picture of Marie Antoinette, his companions laughed and whispered among themselves and called him Darazon, the lover of the Queen.

One day General de La Fayette arrived at Chavaniac from Paris. It was just at the time that the Court of France was amusing itself a la pastorale, at Trianon, and great lords and ladies masqueraded in the garb of shepherds and shepherdesses, millers and milkmaids, and thrust their aristocratic feet into wooden shoes—dainty ones, to be sure, but still genuine wooden sabots. And it was Marie Antoinette herself who wore the first pair.

All this the Marquis recounted to the groups of peasants in the forest, where he went, good Marquis that he was, for a friendly gossip with his people. Darazon listened breathlessly—wide-eyed and eager.

"The Queen wears sabots? Sabots did you say?"

"Yes!"

"And if—if I should make her a pair, would you give them to her—would you, Monsieur le Marquis?"

"Why, yes," replied the General, smiling; "only remember to make them far too pretty even for your sweetheart and quite pretty enough for your Queen."

Darazon answered nothing. Only daybreak found him at his work, and when twilight fell he was still working, and nearly all the night he worked by a feeble light in his hut. In fifteen days he had made a little pair of sabots—prettier than the prettiest sabots de noces.

They were finished! Darazon took them carefully in his right hand. He went through the forest and along the steep road until he came to the great chateau. He knocked and asked to see Monsieur le Marquis.

"It is I," he said; "and here are the Queen's sabots."

"You have really made them, then," said the General.

He took them from Darazon and looked at them curiously. They were delicately fashioned from the wood of the chestnut, waxed and exquisitely polished; they were slender, elegant and daintily pointed—because they were for a Queen and not for a peasant; they were covered with a delicate tracery of vines, and beautifully carved on the toe of each little shoe was a heart, wreathed by a garland twined through the letters T. T. L. V.

The Marquis smiled. He knew the significance of these four letters, which every lover of Auvergne has carved upon the sabots of his sweetheart.

The Marquis de La Fayette returned to Paris, and true to his promise, carried the sabots to the Queen at Trianon. He told their simple little story. Trianon was pastoral-mad and Marie Antoinette was enchanted. What! To have real sabots! Sabots such as peasants wear! And made by a real sabotier!

"This heart, Marquis," said the Queen, "wreathed in 'favors' like the hands of the Virgin, that I can understand; but these letters T. T. L. V?"

"Your Majesty alone has the right to permit me, or rather to command me to translate them."

"Translate, then; it is my desire."

"Taimerai tonta la vida."

"But I cannot understand this strange language!"

"This strange language is the patois of Auvergne, your Majesty, and means 'I will love thee all my life.'"

"The truth is," continued the Marquis, "that this poor sabotier, who is a little simple, worships Your Majesty in the shape of a small portrait."

"Poor fellow! Brave fellow!" murmured the Queen tenderly. "The sabots, Monsieur le Marquis, seem to me a trifle large, but they will the better hold the recompense!" and Marie Antoinette whispered something in the ear of the Princess de Lamballe, who smiled, took the sabots, and left the room, returning with the little wooden shoes filled with as much gold as they could hold.

"And, now, Marquis," said the Queen, "will you have this gold sent in a casket to your young sabotier, with my warmest thanks, and say also—no! say nothing more!"

And the contents of the little shoes were sent.

But Paris was on the eve of the Revolution, and the wooden shoes were forgotten. 1789, 1792, 1793 passed like peals of thunder, each more terrible than the last.

Darazon, in the heart of the forest, knew this—like the rest of the world. There was terrible anguish in his heart, but he said nothing. Finally came the news of the imprisonment of the royal family in the Temple. After this Dazaron grew still more silent and sombre. One day he disappeared from the forest. They searched his hut. On the table lay an empty, open casket. The old musket and the picture of Marie Antoinette were gone.

Darazon was on the road to Paris.

He reached the city on the 17th of October, 1793—in wild rage with the tormentors of the Queen.

At the Place de la Bastile he accosted a patriot wearing a scarlet cap and armed with a club.

"How can I reach the Temple?"

"What do you want there?"

"To deliver the Queen."

"The Austrian? She is a head shorter since yesterday!" replied the man with a ferocious gesture.

Darazon, pale as death, snatched his musket from his shoulder, but the patriot dealt him a crushing blow with the club and the peasant fell, like a stone.

The mob gathered instantly. The peasant's body was roughly searched. On his breast they found the portrait of Marie Antoinette, beneath it the suspicious letters T. T. L. V. Ah then! This man was a complot.

"Away with him!"

The poor body was seized and hurried to the Seine.

The river silently opened her arms to receive the poor sabot maker of Auvergne—the lover of the Queen—with the dear gold pieces hidden in his peasant's blouse and the sacred image next his heart.

The Spectator

An Unfortunate Misunderstanding

How absurd to believe that anybody in Los Angeles would ever knock San Francisco! The people of Los Angeles wouldn't be so provincial as to do such a thing. There is none of the parochial spirit in Los Angeles. Besides San Francisco isn't of sufficient importance to excite the envy of anybody in the beautiful, growing metropolis of the citrus belt. The people of Los Angeles are really glad to know that we have accomplished wonderful things since the catastrophe and that the population has increased. When Phil Stanton, candidate for the Speakership of the Assembly came to town the other day, he made haste to explain when I asked him about the vote on the proposition for the improvement of San Francisco harbor that it was all the result of a misunderstanding. The good people of Los Angeles, notwithstanding the circulars they had received, believed that we were opposed to both of the harbor propositions. They are awfully sorry to learn that we really wanted to improve the harbor, for they would have liked to help out.

The Gentle Rap

In view of the sentiments of the people of Los Angeles toward this city it is curious that from an atmosphere conducive to good will and sympathetic interest there should emanate at brief intervals misrepresentations designed to do us injury. The latest instance of this perversity is furnished by the New York Sun in which there appeared recently a letter from Los Angeles dated October 27 and signed "Marius, Jr." The letter was written ostensibly for the purpose of taking part in a discussion on the subject of restaurants, someone having written to the Sun to say that nowhere in New York can we find a cuisine "that is distinctive as well as palatable." "Marius Jr." called attention to a Spanish restaurant near Los Angeles, which has, perhaps, the very finest cuisine in all this wide world. But he wasn't satisfied with boosting the wonderful Los Angeles restaurant. There was a time, he says, when San Francisco was included among the cities that had restaurants of some distinction. But, "sad to relate," San Francisco "can no longer lay claim to the spirit or the material things Will Irwin so vividly described as once existing in that dear old and dead town." Not a bad knock that! Reads much as though it might have been written by some Middle West carpet-bagger who comes to San Francisco whenever he wants a square meal.

A Stocking Presentation

One of the big hits made at the Princess Theatre the other night was the result of the participation in the performance of two gay members of the Bohemian Club. Their act was entirely impromptu and was as unexpected on the stage as it was in the audience. The Bohemians were of the audience, and took no part in the show until the scene in which the telephone mouthpieces are thrown over the footlights. Each of the Bohemians seized a mouthpiece and to each mouthpiece when it was pulled back to the stage was attached a pair of silk stockings. Kolb and Dill caught sight of the stockings, took them from the chorus girls by whom they had been received and flaunted them to the audience, much to the embarrassment, I am told, of the donors. It is not unusual for chorus girls to be presented with silk stockings by their admirers, but so far as I know the method of presentation adopted at the Princess is entirely original. The chorus girls to whom the stockings were presented, it should be explained, had been engaged in teaching the two Bohemians one of the dances in "Playing the Ponies," and this dance was recently done at the Bohemian Club, one of the stocking gallants impersonating a female in a beautiful costume and yards of lingerie.

"What good did his money do him?"
"It got him an affinity."

A Story of the Wilderness

A very graphic account of a duel between two bull elks in which a third elk attempted to play the part of peacemaker, was printed in a book entitled "The Wilderness Hunter," published in 1894. It was a "deadly encounter" and " a splendid sight." With locked horns and glaring eyes the elks strove against each other, "getting their hind legs well under them, straining every muscle in their huge bodies, and squealing savagely." This combat went on for some time when a curious thing happened. One of two on-looking elks, a yearling, became much excited by the battle, and began to walk between the combatants, nodding his head and uttering a "queer, whistling noise." The fighters separated, but as soon as the interfering, whistling elk moved away they went at it again. A second time the peacemaker approached "nodding his head," whistling and threatening; and again they separated." The action of the third elk was singular, to say the least, and only the high authority upon which the story is based saves it from consignment to the category of "nature fakes." We cannot doubt, however, upon this unimpeachable testimony, (1) that bull elks squeal while engaged in mortal combat; (2) that elks not engaged in such combat and being merely spectators, may feel an almost human desire to promote peace and good will between the belligerents; (3) that this almost human desire manifesting itself in the heart of an elk is indicated by a "queer, whistling noise" and "noddings of the head"; (4) that, consequently, animals of the elk kind, in any event, think logically up to a certain point and are animated by almost humane and wholly benevolent impulses. There can be no doubt of it.

Killing a Peacemaker

The sequel of the story is a tragedy tersely told by the wilderness hunter in the first person. "This was repeated once or twice," he writes, "and I began to be afraid lest the breeze, which was light and puffy, should shift and give them my wind. So, resting my rifle on my knee, I fired twice, putting one bullet behind the shoulder of the peacemaker and the other behind the shoulder of one of the combatants." So died the peacemaker of the forest glade, a noble sacrifice to the pot of the wilderness hunter! Still, as we contemplate the tragic episode, we cannot suppress a throb of pity for the fate of the peacemaking elk, nor wholly banish the regret that the spare bullet was not bestowed upon the shoulder of the other fighting elk. This feeling is emphasized by the circumstance that the wilderness hunter who killed the peacemaker of the northernforest was, a few years afterward, proclaimed the greatest peacemaker of his day and rewarded with the Nobel prize and $40,000 in gold coin. For, unbelievable as the assertion may be, the author of the book from which this extract is taken—the wilderness hunter who killed the peacemaking elk—was no other person than Theodore Roosevelt.

The Easymarks of San Francicsò

There is nobody that appreciates the hospitality of San Francisco so much as does the book agent. Of this I have been assured by a suave, polished individual who has done much toward rehabilitating San Francisco from the literary standpoint. He came hither with a large supply of engraved cards, and a large stock of books "no gentleman's library should be without." He "worked" the town with all the skill of a shell-and-pea artist and left behind him editions de luxe galore—stately folios and genteel duodecimos, books of polished calf tooled in figures of arabesque and books of levantine Turkey, rich with deeply grained colors. There is no place on earth, he informed me, where it is so easy to sell books for show as in San Francisco. "Down in your suburban, fashionable village of Burlingame, especially," he said; "that is where they like elegant books in costly bindings. Flattered by the company with which the possession of books connects the owner, they grab at the classics and the standard authors. You can see after a little conversation with them that they don't know a thing about the inside of books, but they must have 'em; for, you know, many libraries were destroyed in the fire." From a local bookseller I obtained confirmation of the words of the eastern agent. "The town has been flooded with agents," he said, "and they have been getting fancy prices for so-called editions de luxe which are carried by every subscription bookseller in the country. I know two or three prominent citizens who pride themselves on their culture, whose names are registered as the names of easymarks in eastern publishing houses that print Shelley in ten fancy volumes for suckers."

"Did that fashionable doctor relieve you at all?"
"Yes, of considerable money. His touch is more potent than his prescriptions."

Silken-Skirted Club Rules

The Miner divorce case confirms and emphasizes the old-fashioned notion of old-fashioned clubmen that a man's club should be exclusively such and as free of the eternal feminine as was Eden after the Fall. It is set down in the transcript of the Miner divorce suit that the lady in the case "rustled her silken skirts and clinked glasses with bachelor bucks" in the Bohemian and University clubs as if these had been cafes on the rialto or boozing joints on the Great White Way of the red litten tenderloin. This will never do; the house rules of the Bohemian club must be radically amended and the domestic arrangements of the University club must be modified to suppress the silken sad uncertain rustling of all skirts and to prohibit their bachelor bucks from clinking glasses with other men's wives. Imagine such dainty drinking bouts whispered of the Pacific Union or the Cosmos! Talk of "fantastic terrors never felt before!" Why, it's enough to depopulate both the Bohemian and the University of every married member and to crowd the waiting lists with jovial, witty, bibulous, professorial bachelor bucks whose ears are attuned to the sloughing swish of silken skirts and the tinkling-cymbal clinking of glasses wherein the wine moveth itself aright and maketh the heart glad. Perhaps there are enough old-fashioned clubmen in the Bohemian and University clubs to force this sautary reform, to the end that the wives at home, waiting for the return of their lords, may not suspect an errant motive in the absence of an errant knight beyond the clock-stroke of club time. Self preservation should be the first law of a clubman's nature, and a man's club should be above reproach or even suspicion.

Minister—"Did you ever try to swear off drinking."
Toper—"No, I haven't got so bad as to add perjury to my other sins."

Who Shall Eat the Leek?

A feud is on between Sacramento and Berkeley. The college town began it by demanding that the State capital be removed from Sacramento to Berkeley. Sacramento now retorts by demanding that the State University be removed from Berkeley to Sacramento. This thrust at Berkeley's most vital reason for existence is quickly followed by another in the appointment of Miss Eva Withrow as the head of California's art exhibit at the Alaska-Yukon Exposition to be held in Seattle, an appointment said to have been procured by Sacramento intrigue to discomfit Alameda county by subordinating Miss Sallie Daingerfield, a Berkeley artist who was supposed to be in charge of the exhibit, but who is now merely the curator of the department of arts and crafts, a sub-section entirely removed from the superior section of "fine arts." What Berkeley will do in the way of retaliation has not transpired. Something, however, must be done. The honor of Berkeley is under fire and the academic city cannot rest silent in the presence of the taunting, jeering enemy. On the other hand Sacramento is out for revenge and a merry war is more than imminent. Sacremento was badly scared by the Berkeley boomers; and when the scare was dissipated by the voters of the State anger took the place of fright—anger at Berkeleyan presumption and anger in the thought that Berkeley real estate had been advertised at the expense of Sacramnto's pride and dignity. Nothing stings like ridicule, and Sacramento has been made ridiculous. There will be a lot doing in Sacramento hereafter in the effort to even the score with Berkeley and leave something over for good measure.

Protocolling a Plebiscite

As the quarrel between these cities is likely to become wearisome to the rest of the State during its progress, I propose that the Legislature which meets next January put a quietus on the whole business by acceding to the demands of both villages. Let us be given a voting proposition for the ensuing election wherein we may exchange the capital at Sacramento for the State University at Berkeley. It will be fair, and therefore no robbery of either. The capital certainly ought to be nearer the center of population; and the State University would be in a better location anywhere farther away from the temptations and alluring delights of the metropolis. If the capital is located in Berkeley, or Alameda or Haywards, a vast amount of money will be saved to the taxpayers in shorter mileage of the temporary statesmen; and if the students of the State University are sent to Sacramento they will be placed in a peaceful, cloisteral, far-from-the-madding-crowd atmosphere eminently suited to encourage scholastic achievement and philosophic meditation. By this arrangement there need be no outlay for buildings; the State capitol will make a capital schoolhouse for the students, and the University buildings will serve admirably for the official residence of the State employes. Sacramento needs the university and Berkeley needs the capital; by an exchange of libraries alone Sacramento would gain knowledge that is not afforded by the circulating and best seller department of the State library; and Berkeley would be compelled to abandon its holier-than-thou attitude toward the rest of the State by abolishing its mile-limit liquor ordinance. Anyway the plan which I propose would nip this bellum municipium in gemma—squelch it a-borning, so to speak.

Jordan, the Simple Speller

The members of the self-constituted Spelling Board who are being laughed at by educated men wherever English is spoken have agreed to disagree on the subject of that dear old veteran of the language "through." Some time ago that harmless, inoffensive representative of the dictionary family was banished by the Board with all the ceremonial of book, bell and candle; and for all the purposes which it had served during a long and honorable career was substituted that ugly dwarf "Thru." Now comes the news that there is some likelihood of the exile being recalled. What naturally might have been expected has occurred: the simple spellers cannot agree on a rule for simple spelling. The first to kick over the traces was that omniscient scholar of Palo Alto, David Starr Jordan, who knows everything that has been dreamt of in philosophy and a few things which are accessible only to the intelligence of a Jordan. Jordan is true to "Through." He won't consent to its eradication. Why not I have not been informed. I am inclined to the opinion that his objection is entirely sentimental; for if we are to ignore usage and help forward obliteration of all traces of the derivation and history of words then something must be done about "Through." If we are to reduce spelling to a scientific basis then why should we give seven different sounds to one symbol "ough," as in "bough," "cough," "dough," "hiccough," "tough," "through," "thorough"? Knowing everything, as he does, Dr. Jordan knows that an alphabet being a code of signs is faulty if one letter or set of letters represents more than one sound, or if one symbol can be translated to the ear by more than one sound. Our alphabet unquestionably is defective, but if we are to reform it scientifically we must not be sentimental. If we are to be sentimental we must not tamper with words that we have regarded with affection all our lives. Under which king, Bezonian Jordan? Come, an answer. As a member of the Simple Spelling Board you've reduced the great university at Palo Alto to the level of the normal school at Greeley, Colo., which is fifty-two miles northeast of Denver and which practices simple spelling. Do not make it still more ridiculous as a simple speller by showing that you are qualified only to make confusion worse confounded.

An Intractable Vegetable

Dr. Luther Burbank's edible cactus may be a bonne bouche for Angora goats and Texas steers, but it is a tasteless morsel for the high livers and gastronomes of San Francisco; the edible cactus may please the palate of the Santa Rosan gourmet, but it is dust and ashes upon the esophagous of the cafe-trained epicures of the metropolis. This spineless "creation" of the vegetable "wizard" of the Golden West was tried on the food experts of the Fairmont and by them found wanting in many qualities that should go to the making of a delicate and relishable dinner accompaniment in any form, cooked in a pot or mixed with a salad. The Burbank cactus may be edible but it is not eatable, and it is declared by those who make of eating a study as well as a pleasure, that in its present state of development it could not be cooked or otherwise prepared for consumption and digestion by educated stomachs, though its ultimate appeal were the result of the genius of a Brillat-Savarin. These gourmands insist that a taste for the cactus in its present condition of edibility cannot even be "acquired," like that for cavaire and olives; there is really nothing to "acquire"; one might as readily "acquire" a taste for the dessicated pulp of the Oregon fir or a curried ragout of Shasta daisies. As an oddity in vegetarian dietary, say the contemners, it might have been welcomed to a Vitellian banquet, but these classicists remind us in this regard that Vitellius was a Roman glutton who accepted everything eatable and was not at all averse to anything that nobody else could eat. Dr. Burbank need not be discouraged at this preliminary rebuff. Genius is invariably flouted in its first manifestation. Even those who refuse to eat the edible cactus say that they believe Dr. Burbank can improve his "creation." They suggest that he experiment with hybridization involving the pollen of the egg plant, the oyster plant, the plaintain, or the esculent yam of Fiji, which is also spined like the cactus and might be unspined by the Burbank process to fit the requirements of amalgamation with the spineless cactus. The critical epicures return Dr. Burbank's contribution to their alimentary magazine with thanks, as unsuitable for the special needs of their dietary; but they temper the rejection with an encouraging postscript to the effect that the wizard go to it once more along the lines suggested in impregnable confidence that he will eventually "create" something fit to eat.

He—"I love you, but I'm so nervous I'm afraid I can't propose."
She—"And I'm so nervous because you won't."

When "Oakland" Shall Be a Memory

Announcement is made from the other side of the bay that of the 34,040 citizens of Oakland, Berkeley, Alameda, Fruitvale, Piedmont, San Leandro and Elmhurst who voted at the last election, 20,014 signed a petition to the legislature to pass an enabling act under which these same citizens may vote to consolidate themselves into a city and county. The showing is a good one if it represents the majority sentiment of each of the communities sought to be included in the consolidation. Heretofore there has been some objection by the citizens of Berkeley and Alameda to the proposition, chiefly on the ground that these cities are more respectable than Oakland; better governed; more economically administered; and wholly satisfied with conditions as they exist. It is possible that Berkeley has changed her mind in this matter since she lost the capital and is threatened with the loss of the State University; and it is possible that Alameda, on maturer consideration and closer analysis of the Oakland method of bonding, re-bonding and otherwise taxing its property owners, has finally decided that as these bonds and taxes cannot be charged to Alameda she can reap a large profit by accepting the benefits to accrue from this taxation. It is probable that the question of consolidation will come fairly before the citizens of these towns and cities; and it is possible that the consolidation will eventually be effected; but there is going to be a great rumpus over the name of the new city. It is generally conceded that there are too many "Oaklands" on the map, and it will probably be necessary for Oakland to consign her name to the limbo of other famous cities that have been—to be as Memphis and Thebes and Palmyra, and to hope that posterity will remember her achievements and failures as are remembered the history of those other cities now lost in the dim distance of antiquity where

> "In the red desert moulders Babylon
> And the wild serpent's hiss
> Echoes in Petra's palaces of stone
> And waste Persepolis."

What name will be chosen for the new city cannot be foretold; but it is pretty safe to guess that it will not be Berkeley, Alameda, San Leandro, Fruitvale, Piedmont, Melrose, Fitchburg, Allandale or Elmhurst; Oakland has votes enough to defeat any of those names; and it is also safe to assume that the new city will not be called "East San Francisco."

How to Advertise a New Metropolis

This question of naming the new city across the bay will certainly stir up much strife among the citizens of the several communities to be involved. Each of these communities banks on its "prestige" and wallows in its "local pride." As "boroughs" of the new municipality, each will retain its name, of course; but the generic title will certainly be something entirely different. Perhaps it would be a good plan to submit the question of a name to the voters of the entire nation at the next general election; or the consolidated city might offer a prize of say $10,000 for "the best name" in a competition open to all the world. It would be worth at least $10,000 to get a good name for the clustered towns of Alameda county after they have ceased to be a part of that county; and besides, it would be a tremendous advertisement for the new city—a world-wide advertisement that would bring the new city to the immediate attention of millions of people looking for easy money. Then, when the city is well consolidated and fitly named, it will probably be necessary to annex it to San Francisco. There's no telling what Destiny has in store for all of us or for any of us. In the meantime, however, there's going to be a lot of trouble over that name for our prospective "sister city" across the bay.

"Does your wife go through your pockets when you're asleep?"
"Does she. You ought to see the pockets after she gets through with them."

In the old days when Willis and his brother Dan used to play the banjo at Press Club jinks, his pretensions as an architect inspired a deal of banter. Nobody took him seriously. It was admitted that he had considerable artistic taste and could design a pretty gateway or a handsome fireplace, but as for putting up a real building or designing anything except for show, the idea was preposterous. Has a very keen sense of the beautiful, his amiable friends admitted, but he's only a dreamer, dotes on Doric columns, Gothic effects and Byzantine fol de rols. It was said that he designed a house one time which could be entered only through the second story, and that the kitchen chimney ran into the bath tub. When Burnham, the Chicago architect, established an office here and took Polk in as an associate, the wise ones at the club gasped with astonishment. They felt sorry for Burnham. Well, to make a long story short, Polk's genius has been vindicated. He is the architect of the First National Bank building, a pretty substantial looking structure, easy of access, well lighted, and free from flaws. The surprising thing about it is that instead of costing more than the estimate it cost less. Evidently Polk has quit dreaming.

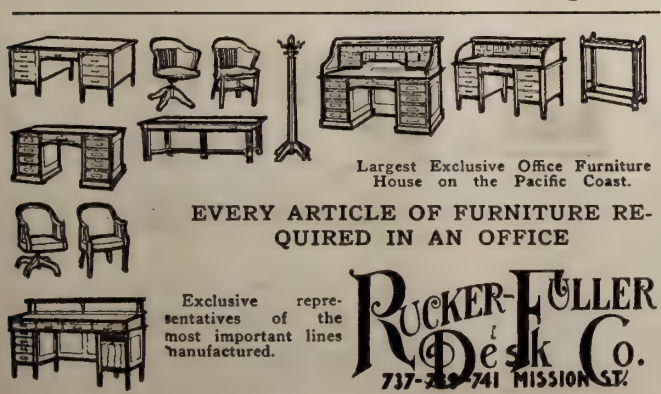
A Question of Privilege



I am not so sure that Superintendent Bunker of the Berkeley school department is entirely accurate in assuming that he or the board of education can deny the privileges of the schools of that city to members of fraternities and sororities merely on that account. If the students by reason of their membership in these organizations are deficient in their studies or if they fail to reach the prescribed standards they may be dealt with individually as each case may require; but if a student accomplishes all that is expected of him and does not obtrude his fraternity upon the school to the detriment of the school, I do not see why he should be denied graduation or promotion. As long as a fraternity does not interfere with the course of study the member of a fraternity certainly has a right under the laws of the land to receive the education for which his taxpaying parents are paying. My own objection to these societies, especially those attached to some of the high schools, is on quite another basis. I think that a high school fraternity or sorority is an incentive to snobbery. They tend to inculcate a caste distinction entirely antagonistic to the spirit of our democratic institutions. They are fool imitations of the university societies by boys and girls whose knickerbockers and pinafores are still being worn by their younger brothers and sisters. They mean nothing because the members are not yet mentally capable of comprehending the purpose of an organization of this character. If the chief requirement of membership was high standing in the classes of the school to which they are attached there would be less objection to their existence; but as a matter of fact most of them are merely vehicles for the creation of a social distinction that owing to the extreme youth of the members cannot be maintained and which ought not to be encouraged. Still I do not think that a boy or girl who attains the required percentages in studies and deportment can, legally, be debarred from graduation or promotion.

A McAllister in Vaudeville

With a McAllister on the Orpheum stage there ought to be some fashionable parties at the vaudeville theatre next week. The McAllister who is coming is none other than our old friend Hall McAllister, nephew of the McAlllister who fenced off the Four Hundred of New York from the polloi, and son of the Hall McAllister whose statue adorns the grass plot in front of the City Hall on the street that bears his name. Hall McAllister, the actor, began his career in the profession of his distinguished father, but the law was not to his taste and about seven years ago he went East and to the surprise of his friends made his appearance on the stage. He has been true to the drama ever since, and though now in vaudeville he is still in the drama, for it is a one-act play that he is presenting. When last seen in this city McAllister was a member of Margaret Anglin's company.

A Great Journalist

Sam Chamberlain is on one of his periodical visits to San Francisco, and as usual is spending most of his time in the Examiner office. Mr. Chamberlain is probably the ablest newspaperman on Mr. Hearst's staff. His specialty is news handling, and as the manager of news-gathering facilities he has no superior in this country. He was among the original Examiner men, becoming managing editor of the paper shortly after Will Hearst assumed control. In the days when the Examiner was splurging, when it assumed the title of "Monarch of the Dailies," and made and won the fight for supremacy, which it has since retained, Chamberlain was at the helm. Prior to his coming to this city Chamberlain was the editor of the New York Herald and the chum of James Gordon Bennett. It was Chamberlain who established for Bennett the Morning News in Paris.

The Resurrection of Wilde

Once more the story that Oscar Wilde is still alive has been revived. This time in the Examiner of last Sunday. George Sylvester Viereck first exploited that story in the Critic of July, 1905, and there is nothing new in the Examiner story, except that it attributes to the late Sybil Sanderson and the current Mary Garden knowledge of the imposture said to have been practiced in the interest of the unfortunate poet by his friends. Much is made of the circumstances that the funeral was an unostentatious affair and that a burial plot had been rented for a limited term long before the reported illness of Wilde. There were excellent reasons at the time of Oscar Wilde's death why his funeral should be conducted as quietly and unostentatiously as was decent. It was never the intention of his friends that his remains should lie permanently where they were first laid. Americans, who are not conversant with foreign customs are apt to become unduly excited over matters which they do not comprehend. They are horrified at the idea of renting a grave for a limited term, yet see no fault in their own custom of allowing burial places to fall into neglect and decay, the ground to be in time utilized for other purposes, and the bodies, or what remains of them, to be removed to a common plot in a pauper cemetery. It is only when such things are done in France or Spain or Italy that they are to be condemned. In these days of half-baked occultism, when Ella Wheeler Wilcox believes that she was Cleopatra and several other fascinating personalities, when there is a Mary, Queen of Scots, wandering about Europe, and any number of other celebrities and notorities abroad, it is probably only an afterthought that kept us so long without a resurrection of Oscar Wilde. Once start a rumor, no matter how preposterous, and there is never a lack of corroborative evidence. The same hypnotic influence which will lead a mob into violence which the individuals composing it would not commit alone seems to be responsible for the way in which evidence can be gathered for any proposition it may be wanted to sustain. The old trick of asking a room full of small children to listen for the fall of a pin, only to have a large percentage of them assert that they heard the sound never made, is familiar to us. Scientific tests have proved that comparatively few people see even the color of objects they look at, that they are incapable of correctly measuring time, space, speed or direction, and that in general their evidence is based on what they expect to notice. The frequency with which prisoners are positively identified, and afterward released because they have proved themselves to be other than the person wanted ought to make reasonable folk careful about positive statements. The probabilities are that some incautious one has remarked that a passing stranger bore some resemblance to Oscar Wilde, and that the rest is simply the old nursery game of "Russian Scandal," in which the first player makes a statement to the second in whispered tones; the second repeats to the third what he thinks he heard, and so on till the circuit is completed, whereupon the leader tells aloud what he did say and the last what he thought he heard. The result is always interesting and often instructive. When Mr. Viereck sprung his "surprise" on the literary world all he had to offer by way of evidence was what "a lady" whispered in broken sentences during an operatic performance and the admission of a bookseller's clerk in New York (name also withheld) on the supposition that he was speaking in confidence to one in on the secret that he had held a ten-minute conversation with Wilde in the street of that city within a fortnight. As another portion of the legend made him a monk in a Spanish monastery, where his identity was unknown to any but his superior, and still another domiciled him in Italy, there is, to say the least, little coherence in the "testimony." At all events, a sensation three years and a half old has earned a rest.

Rose Eytinge Is Penniless

From Portland, Ore., comes the news that Rose Eytinge, or "Lady Rose," as she was known, once upon a time a queen of the stage, is living in that city in straightened circumstances. Through illness she has become almost incapacitated from any regular work and on account of recent unlucky speculations she is now absolutely penniless. Mina Crolius Gleason of the Bungalow Theatre in Portland writes as follows on the subject of a fund which is now being raised: "I feel sure that Miss Eytinge has many friends who would be glad to contribute to this fund—a fund we are trying to raise to give a little comfort to a woman who was a great artist in her day and is now seventy years of age; a woman who throughout her life cast her bread upon the waters in many directions, with no thought of its returning."

Advertising Agency Removes

M. L. Hadley, who for the past twenty years has conducted a large and most successful newspaper advertising agency on the Pacific Coast, has removed his San Francisco offices to the Metropolis Bank building, the very heart of the financial and business center of the city. The very best advertising writers and specialists have been secured and the Hadley agency is more than ever a factor in the upbuilding and development of commercial and financial interests of the coast. One of the new features in connection with the agency is the promotion bureau or department for the use of clients wishing to float high-grade securities.

WEEKLY FINANCIAL OUTLOOK

By R. E. Mulcahy

Another week of advancing securities has been seen. There seems no stop to the upward trend of values. The market showed no favorites. Many low-priced stocks which have been dormant for a year took on new life and moved upward with the higher priced column. The week's gossip was most encouraging. The industrial list reported many large orders for their products having been booked since election. The American Locomotive Company reported orders pouring in faster than they could take care of them. The American Car and Foundry Company ordered its Detroit plant put into operation at once; this plant will give employment to 3500 men. The Steel Foundries Company will add 1500 additional men to their force. All of the larger manfacturing concerns are adding from ten to thirty per cent additional employes to their force. It is roughly estimated that fully one million laborers, mechanics, etc., have been given employment since November 4th. The time is growing very near when idle men will be a thing of the past. Stocks of all kinds of manufactured goods are extremely low; the period of over-production has passed; consumers will find it hard for some time to come to have their requirements filled with any reasonable dispatch. The most favorable condition in the commercial channel of business is the cheapness of money. It is almost certain we are to pass the period of tight money this year unmolested. About three hundred millions will be paid out in the way of dividends on January 1st; the time of disbursement being so close it is only reasonable to anticipate the continuance of low rates for at least one year more. Money will seek investment ere long at rates that will permit of many needed improvements throughout the whole country. It is believed a flood of eastern money will find its way to California for permanent employment. The large transcontinental railway lines are using every effort to bring into service an army of laborers. New extensions are being considered, both steam and electric lines, which will result in the immediate development of a vast amount of new territory adding to the greatness of our country. When one considers the vast resources of this country and the greater part yet to be developed, what can we expect to see twenty years hence? It is no idle talk to say that our country has outgrown its railway facilities; this condition will be more plainly shown as time goes on. It will be surprising if the greatest congested condition of freight traffic ever known does not become a reality the coming year. If law makers would show a little judgment the transportation companies could avoid such conditions by making the necessary improvements. The day of the rail fence orator has passed. The watchword for some time to come will be progress upon fair lines to both the public and transportation lines. The changed conditions in relation to railroads is plainly seen in the great demand for their short time notes which sixty days ago had few seekers. Almost every series of security issued by the Union and Southern Pacific is now eagerly sought after; this is not only true on this side of the Atlantic but on the other side, where, in fact, all of the Harriman issues are favorably thought of. The new high price record of the United States Steel common and preferred stocks caused many to believe an announcement of an increase in the dividend of the common stock would be made known soon. It is hardly reasonable to expect an increase at this particular time when the company is putting so much of its profits into betterments. No doubt within the coming year the common stock will be placed upon a five per cent basis. There is every reason to expect the common stock of the American Locomotive Company and the American Car and Foundry Company to return to their old dividend basis very soon; the earnings of both warrant this expectation. The copper properties are not receiving the favorable consideration many had anticipated. Stocks of copper, while not large, are quite sufficient for present consumptive demands. Later on a better price for the raw material will develop when these securities will have their day. The market for all kinds of securities ought to have what is termed a healthy reaction, and it may come unexpectedly. It is wise to take a cautious position until such a reaction has been seen. The public buying of late has been strong, the market could easily get into an over-bought state and cause a sharp reaction; on any decline of this character stocks and bonds can be safely bought. Before this bull movement is over present prices will look cheap. This does not mean that reactions from time to time will not appear.

Our New Smart Set

To get on the list of ladies who are to have charge of the Colonial dances at the St. Francis is one of the most difficult of achievements, I am told. At these dances is to be set the high-water mark of exclusiveness in our provincial but nevertheless exalted, aristocracy. The bars have been let down too often of late it is said, and the line must be drawn somewhere. Now for the bull of excommunication. Soon we shall know who is really who and who has not been properly branded. The list of patronesses is being made with much deliberation and great caution. Mrs. Henry T. Scott is in charge of the incubation of the new smart set and her judgment or discretion is not to be disputed. This is the list to date: Mrs. William H. Crocker, Mrs. Robert S. Coleman, Mrs. Sidney Cushing, Mrs. William Lent, Mrs. Robert J.

An Episode

A French maid, an aristocratic bulldog and a loaf of French bread figured in an amusing episode in Van Ness avenue on Sunday morning a week ago. The maid was of the household of the Vincent de Laveagas of Menlo, who have taken the de Vecchi house on Jackson street for the winter. Of the three it was the dog alone that knew the bread which had been left at the door that morning. The dog saw the bread before the maid saw it, but she must see the dog take the bread before the dog had time to eat it. Seeing that he was observed by the maid the dog set off with the loaf, the maid after him. Down by Van Ness avenue she met the dog with the loaf, the maid pursuing. Into Van Ness marched the dog and laughed with great French gusto and still pursued by a valiant French maid. In the opposite direction came Mrs. de Laveaga on the way home from church and to her she told the story of the theft. The maid pursuing the dog and the dog pursued by the maid, all excited. "I only care about the bread, but I know the dog knows I know the city and I was afraid he'd get lost."

His Aquarian Sentiments

A book reminds me of another dog story. One day last summer Dan Murphy was on hand to be bound to Burlingame with a dog tucked up on the seat beside him. "The nerve," said the conductor, "dogs are not allowed in the passenger cars. You'll have to take him into the baggage car."

"I'll do nothing of the kind," said Murphy.

The conductor insisted that the dog should be removed. Mr. Murphy was obdurate. During the discussion the dog jumped off the seat and got beneath it and Mr. Murphy refused to budge. As Murphy started to leave the train at Burlingame the conductor asked him if he wasn't going to take the dog with him.

"He isn't my dog," said Murphy.

Contagious Bohemianism

Even in Bohemia the lights sometimes grow dim, the music is almost hushed, the songs lose their Beranger quality, and the laughter becomes spasmodic for lack of proper wit incentive. So thought L. Ventura, litterateur, bon vivant and almost earnest disciple of Murger, Verlaine and Baudelaire, one day recently, while pondering upon what he regarded as inexcusable apathy of the Sequoia Club in matters of essentially Bohemian import. Mr. Ventura's idea of what should constitute the animating spirit, the essence as it were, of Sequoian purpose, is best expressed in the material things of Bohemia, which are music, lights, some to make the heart merry, quips and jests to provoke glad laughter and always something good to eat, in environment to fit the occasion. He resolved to revive the drooping Sequoian Bohemianism by giving the real Bohemian element of the club a Bohemian dinner, in a Bohemian atmosphere, amid Bohemian surroundings and absolutely under Bohemian auspices. He chose an Italian restaurant on Polk street near Broadway, redolent of Neapolitan savors and reminiscent of Latin Quarter traditions. He ordered the viands, the wines and the lights, confident that the personnel, the bailiwick and the Bohemian spirit would come as a matter of course. Which is not. The guests were bidden and the feast went forward with alacrity. The lights were bright, the music was up to Bohemian standard, the ravioli and the spaghetti were edible, the wine was drinkable, and the wit was passable. Soon the Bohemian spirit began to move itself aright and attracted the attention of the sidewalk tribes beyond the pale, and these, gazing in wonder at first, through the broad uncurtained windows of the cafe, observing that the male Bohemians were a merry crew, and that the women were smoking cigarettes as if they enjoyed them, were themselves infected with a contagious disorder, and responsive to the lilt of the music began to dance their national dances on the pavement. In kimonas and Mother Hubbards the women outside danced the dances of their native lands; the Italians whirled in the lively tarantella, the Spaniards leaped in mad boleros; the Greeks waltzed gracefully and the Japanese gestured in the cheery dance—all to the tune of a ragtime Bohemian madrigal whipped from the strings of harp and fiddles of a macaroni band. The Bohemians within observing the animation of the Bohemians without, were gratified. They pronounced Mr. Ventura's dinner a great success. His Bohemianism was "catching." It not only permeated the guests at his symposium, but it spread itself abroad to gladden the entire neighborhood. Moreover it certainly revived the drooping Bohemianism of the Sequoia Club.

Sequoia Art Exhibit

The Sequoia Club's art exhibit was opened to private view of the club members and their friends on Saturday, and on Sunday the pictures were placed on public view, to remain until the 28th inst. Much praise is bestowed on Miss Evelyn Withrow's portrait of Mrs. Ramon Wilson and her pastel of the "Crystal Gazer." Other notable features of the exhibit are specimens of Mrs. Bertha Stringer Lee's summer work; and characteristic canvases by Charles Dickman, Margaret Dixon, Del Mue, William Sparks and Theodore Wores. Ada Romer Shawhan exhibited some interesting faces in red chalk. Rose Hooper Plotner was represented in some exquisite miniatures. The critical judges who accepted the pictures were Allan Dunn, Theodore Wores and Will Sparks.

The Directoire

Some handsome and striking gowns were worn at the A. D. Shepard dinner at the Sequoia Thursday evening of last week. Masculine comment, however, seemed to concentrate upon the handsome costume worn by Mrs. Bruguiere, nee Shortridge, made for the de Young wedding. One of these men was inclined to class it with the Directoire mode, but paused somewhat embarrassed by the obvious lack of the side rip that all men think is the distinguishing and necessary feature of this peculiar innovation in feminine gear. Another man, married, and consequently wiser, informed the doubting one that a Directoire is not necessarily an open view of a lovely underskirt. The information was to the effect that the chief requirement of this fashion was a close fit. Whereupon another man, unidentified as to domestic relations, remarked that in his opinion a woman would experience greater difficulty in attempting to sit down attired in a Directoire gown than if she wore no gown at all. Which is indicative of how little most men know about women's clothes anyway.

Athol and Margaret

According to the gossips society has been more expectant than ever since Athol McBean's dinner and theatre party in honor of Margaret Newhall. "This," says a New York society journal which keeps in touch with social affairs in this city, "may be Athol's way of trying to cinch matters." "At any rate," says the same authority, "it is equal to a very broad hint to other aspirants"; furthermore: "Those who claim to know are always throwing them together at affairs, and there is also the little incident of the telegram 'up the road' which greeted Athol on his homeward bound journey early last May."

An Active Hostess

Mrs. Andrew Welch, who has taken her place among the prominent hostesses this season, is a very charming, home-loving woman, but she delights in giving happy little functions for her wide circle of friends. She was Miss de Laveaga before her marriage with the young millionaire. Andrew Welch, by the way, was the despair of matchmaking mothers, for he was so apparently oblivious to feminine charms. His marriage with Miss de Laveaga was a genuine love match. Mr. Welch's sister is Mrs. Eugene Lent. She was a young widow when she met Mr. Lent, who, though presumably an adamant-hearted bachelor, promptly fell in love and pursued a spirited courtship to the altar. The Lents live in San Mateo for the greater part of the year and the Welches are also identified with the San Mateo set. Mrs. Welch's series of luncheons at the Fairmont are talked of as most delightful affairs of the dove order. Other functions are being planned to continue through the season at the Welch's town house in Eddy street.

Such Beautiful Hair

A clever little woman, hearing of a well-known photographer's penchant for draping and coiffing his women sitters, decided that she would have a little fun with him. She is quite a beauty but her hair is not luxuriant. After she had made the appointment for her sitting, she borrowed three different switches from three of her chums whose locks were fortunately of the same shade as her own sparse hirstute adornment. Arrayed in all this reflected glory she proudly set forth to get her picture taken. When she took off her hat and displayed her crown of gold the expected happened. The photographer fell into raptures over her lovely tresses and proceeded to take out the pins. At which, lo and behold! Switch No. 1 dropped off. The artist censured her severely for wearing false hair, when with her wealth of it the addition was so unnecessary. But when the second and third false pieces followed the first he turned the fair jester over to his assistant and faded from the studio.

But San Francisco Has Charms

Jeanne Gallois, it seems, has become reconciled to life in the far west after all. They say she was somewhat bored at first on her return from Paris. There the hospitable Gallois home was the center of much quiet entertaining, prominent literary and artistic geniuses finding in it a most congenial atmosphere. Miss Jeanne, who believes most firmly in having an object in life, found her Paris environment congenial, and heavy time freighted her hands for a month or two after settling here again. But it seems she has changed her mind and has concluded after all that San Francisco has its own particular charms.

Tangled in Her Veil

A very amusing episode occurred the other day at one of the fashionable teas. San Francisco was indulging in one of its festive little afternoon breezes and so, though the young lady of my tale had only a block to go, she deemed it wise to wind a veil around her large black picture hat. Upon arriving at her destination and before entering the reception room to greet her hostess she proceeded to undo the yards of chiffon. Unfortunately a hard knot had gotten in somewhere and the more she tugged the tighter it grew. There was not even the possibility of slipping the veil over her head, nor of climbing out of it and there not a maid in sight. She seated herself on the hall bench and worked leisurely at it for a moment, then as new callers began to appear, she turned frantically to the butler. "Have you a pen knife?" she asked. Immediately he dropped his card tray and dashed gallantly to the rescue. The bell was permitted to ring and ring—somewhat emphatically, too—while the butler tugged at the veil in vain. Finally he took out his knife and cut the young lady out of her predicament.

The Colemans Entertain

Mr. and Mrs. J. V. Coleman entertained at a very pretty dinner dance in the St. Francis last Friday evening in honor of Miss Constance de Young and Mr. Joseph Tobin, whose marriage this Wednesday is one of the most interesting social events of the season. Among those present to meet the guests of honor were Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Brander, Mr. and Mrs. Jack Polhemus, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Eastland, Mr. and Mrs. M. H. de Young, Miss Doris Wilshire, Miss Rebecca Kruttschnitt, Miss de Young, Miss Constance de Young, Miss Katleen de Young, George Cameron, Edgar Mizner, Joseph O. Tobin, James Cameron and Charles de Young.

The Salle Fortune

By the recent marriage of a son of the house of Ellinwood to Miss Salle I was reminded that we still have among us the families of men who struck it rich in the mines. Of the contemporaries of the Bonanza Kings there are not many left in this neck of the woods, but the mines of California and Nevada are a continuous performance, and many are the fortunes that have been made since the days of Mackay and Fair. The Salle fortune is one of the many that came out of the mines. The Salle girls, by the way, while yet in their teens, went to Europe under the chaperonage of a cultured woman, and under her direction they studied music, painting and the languages.

Another Debutante

The debut of Miss Florence Hopkins, youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Hopkins, will take place next Tuesday. This event will be celebrated by one of the largest balls of the season. The fair debutante's sisters, Mrs. A. A. Taylor, Mrs. W. H. Taylor and Mrs. Fred McNear, who are taking a lively interest in the arrangements for the coming function, will assist their father in receiving.

The Rudeness of Him!

A certain debutante function was the subject of discussion. "I'm not going," said the distinguished Burlingame matron who was being urged to contribute to the tone of the affair. "I don't like the way her brother has acted," she explained. "I've had him at two week-end parties and he hasn't had the politeness to call on me."

"I know he has been very rude," said the debutante's friend, "but you shouldn't blame her." The distinguished matron was on hand at the affair, but was inappropriately gowned in a black walking suit. Brother was there too, and he spent most of the afternoon in the company of a pretty debutante. Who cares for the social amenities anyway?

The de Young-Tobin Wedding

The first of the much-talked-of de Young weddings has come and gone and Constance de Young and Joseph Oliver Tobin have been safely launched on the high seas of matrimony. The ceremony took place at noon on Wednesday at St. Mary's Cathedral, Archbishop Riordan officiating. The church was absolutely crowded, so much so that even some of those with entrance cards had to be turned away. Outside over a thousand people were congregated to catch a glimpse of the pretty bride and even the galleries were filled. The altars and sanctuary were elaborately decorated with masses of American Beauty roses so that the bridal party made an exceptionally pretty picture, the bridesmaids' dresses and picture hats repeating the same tints and shading. To the strains of Mendelssohn's wedding march the bridal procession entered the church. The groomsmen were Charles de Young, Harry Simpkins, Edward Tobin, George Cameron, Wellington Gregg and Baldwin Wood. They were followed by the four bridesmaids, Genevieve Harvey, Rebecca Kruttschnitt, Kathleen de Young and Frances Stewart. Helen de Young was maid of honor and, like the bridesmaids, was in a directoire gown and carried a huge bouquet of American Beauties. The bride followed on the arm of her father, M. H. de Young. She certainly looked charming in her gown of white satin and there were many present who admired the grace and dexterity with which she managed her train, as it was fully eight feet long. Her bouquet was a wonderful shower effect of lilies of the valley and her dress was exquisitely trimmed with ropes of pearls and yards of rare old lace. Joe Tobin was attended by his younger brother Cyril as best man. Everybody remarked how blissfully happy he seemed and certainly he did not lose his self possession, as his responses could be heard in the entire church. About one hundred and fifty guests afterwards repaired to the de Young home on California street, where a very sumptuous breakfast was served. The house also was decorated in masses of American beauty roses and presented a truly beautiful appearance. Some of the toasts were exceptionally clever. Constance received some wonderful presents, the most beautiful of all being a magnificent dog collar of diamonds, a gift of Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs. Joseph Tobin's present to his bride was a pair of costly earrings, the most wonderful any San Francisco girl can boast of. Another present from him was a traveling case, fitted in gold trappings. The young couple left for a tour of the southern part of the State, but will be back in time for Helen's marriage to George Cameron, which will be celebrated on the thirtieth.

Back from "Bolder Hill"

Society is awaiting with much interest the reopening of the town house of Mrs. J. D. Grant, which, since her arrival at the St. Francis a few weeks ago, has been rushed toward completion with the furnishing selected abroad by Mrs. Grant to harmonize with the artistic interior arrangement. When the residence is reopened in December it will afford a fitting setting for the delightful entertainments of one of the city's most charming hostesses. Mrs. Grant left here last February and spent the entire summer on her English country estate, "Bolder Hill."

The Donahoe Ball

The Donahoe ball at the Fairmont on Tuesday night was a very brilliant and elaborate function. The affair was to introduce to society Katherine Donahoe, the debutante daughter of the Joseph A. Donahoes. Miss Katherine is barely seventeen, so everyone expected she would spend another year in the schoolroom, and the news that she was to be one of the season's buds came as a delightful surprise to her many friends here. Most of her life has been passed at the Donahoe country home in Menlo Park. Like her cousins, the Parrott girls, she is devoted to riding and out-of-door sports, and while not exactly a pretty girl she has a rare charm of manner that is unusually attractive. The Donahoes belong to the inner Holy of Holies. Mrs. Donahoe was formerly Christine Parrott, the youngest daughter of Mrs. Abby M. Parrott. Like her mother, she believes in having her list extremely blue-penciled and the ball was decidedly exclusive. A great number of the Greenway set were not invited, but among those who were, some twenty or thirty were far from intimate with the family. The ball was really a brilliant success. It was pronounced the most perfect ball ever given here. Madam de Tristan and Miss de

Miss Page-Brown Returning

The news that Mr .and Mrs. Francis Carolan are once more on their homeward way has been received with great rejoicing in the local four hundred, the more so as Miss Katrina Page-Brown is to accompany them. Miss Katrina is well remembered here from the occasion of her former visit and everyone is looking forward to the pleasure of again welcoming her. After all she really is a California girl, for it was only since the shocking accident that brought Page Brown to his untimely death that her mother has returned to New York, the home of her own girlhood. Miss Page-Brown is a very charming girl of a demi-brunette beauty quite her own. Mary Keeney and she used to be quite inseparable, going everywhere together. They were a very stunning couple, their beauty being of such distinctly different types as to attract considerable attention. Young John Parrott, Jr., they say, succumbed to the fair Katrina's charms, and rumors of an interesting engagement between the two were afloat. But John accompanied his family to Europe a year ago and Katrina returned to New York to make her debut and nothing came of it after all. The Carolans are to winter at the Fairmont and so Miss Page-Brown will practically join the season's band of debutantes. A number of elaborate entertainments have already been planned in her honor.

Son's Illness Causes Mother's Return

Mrs. R. E. Mucahy, who has been abroad for the past year, returned last week, having been called home on account of the severe illness of her son, Mr. Frank Coakley, who is now on the road to recovery. Mrs. Mulcahy spent last winter in Egypt. Mr. and Mrs. Mulcahy have taken apartments for the winter at the St. Francis.

Wismer and Ysaye

Hother Wismer, the talented violinist, who recently returned from Europe where he enjoyed the benefit of weeks of study under the direction of that great master Ysaye, will soon give a concert. I am told by a critic who has heard Mr. Wismer since his return that the improvement in his tones is wonderful. Wismer has been delighting his friends with stories of his interesting experience at Ysaye's studio at Godine, a village near Brussels where he spent several pleasant weeks. He was there when the great violinist celebrated his fiftieth birthday and also when he celebrated the birth of a grandson. He says that Ysaye has arranged to give a hundred concerts in Europe this season. While in London Wismer saw a great deal of that talented native son, Sigmund Beel, who is now rated among the leading musicians of the British capital. In New York he met Herman Brandt who is with the Saponoff orchestra.

Colonial Dame Breakfast

One of the most exclusive affairs of the season was the Colonial Dame breakfast which took place at the St. Francis Hotel on Saturday last. The affair was in charge of Mrs. Selden S. Wright, the organizer and president of the local branch. Mrs. Walter D. Mansfield, Miss Elizabeth Jones and Mrs. C. Elwood Brown assisted. The only invited guest was Bishop Nichols, who made a few remarks in a happy vein. Miss Louise Kimball spoke on family trees.

A Birthday Dinner

Mr. Cuyler Lee gave a birthday dinner on Wednesday evening at his home at Pierce and Vallejo streets. Those present were: Mr. Edward M. Greenway, Dr. W. A. McEnery, Joseph B. Murphy, Paul Cowles, Frank Goad, Edgar Mizner, Noble Eaton, Charles Rollo Peters and Courteney Ford.

Far From the Madding

Wise was the foresight of the Fathers in setting aside for thanksgiving celebration a certain day instead of a certain date. Whether intentional or not this adds vastly to the pleasure of the modern Thanksgiving holiday, as it enables one to enjoy four days instead of one. Because of this, busy men and women can find time to get away from the routine of city life and seek the joys of the outdoors at country clubs and hotels. Already there is talk of the large party which is preparing to visit the Yosemite and eat their Thanksgiving dinner amid its wonders. And there are any number of parties being formed to spend the week end among the beautiful surroundings of the Hotel Del Monte. There is talk of an amateur golf tournament for that day, but even if it does not materialize the superb condition of this excellent course will doubtless attract a great many. The Del Monte ground never appeared more beautiful and if the weather is pleasant Manager Warner will have a great family about his festal board.

Motoring to Del Monte

Motor parties are arriving almost daily at Del Monte from all parts of the State. Among recent visitors were Mr. and Mrs. E. Bosbyshell and J. S. Chanslor of Los Angeles; Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Thorson and Mr. and Mrs. Louis Hicks of Berkeley; the junior F. W. Hellmans of

LIQUEUR

PÈRES CHARTREUX

—GREEN AND YELLOW—

This famous cordial, now made at Tarragona, Spain, was for centuries distilled by the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux) at the Monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, France, and known throughout the world as Chartreuse. The above cut represents the bottle and label employed in the putting up of the article since the Monks' expulsion from France, and it is now known as Liqueur Pères Chartreux (the Monks, however, still retain the right to use the old bottle and label as well) distilled by the same order of Monks, who have securely guarded the secret of its manufacture for hundreds of years, taking it with them at the time they left the Monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, and who, therefore, alone possess a knowledge of the elements of this delicious nectar. No Liqueur associated with the name of the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux) and made since their expulsion from France is genuine except that made by them at Tarragona, Spain.

Cunningham a Star

Not to be reminiscent but frankly to afford a pretext for felicitating myself on the vindication of my own judgment I would revive recollections of the dear old Tivoli days of fond memories and cherished associations, the days of peace and tranquility, halcyon days that will return again if we live long enough. Back along the stream of time I would waft sweet memory, through the shadowy past, until upon the retina of the mind's eye there loomed the figure of that bold Irish lad, the highwayman who proved so gallant a hero that he excited the admiration of a certain distinguished lady impersonated for the occasion by Camille D'Arville. The highwayman, let it be recalled, was none other than Arthur Cunningham, the new star of theatredom now beaming over the footlights of the Valencia. In "The Highwayman" Arthur Cunningham first revealed his ability as an Irish character actor. The star of the performance was Camille D'Arville, and Cunningham was not expected to do anything more than improve her opportunities, but according to the judgment expressed in these columns he put that talented lady in penumbra. Indeed, it was here set forth that in the matter of temperament and brogue he was without a peer among the men who make Irish character work their specialty. So enthusiastic was I over his work that I urged several managers to make a star of him in Irish drama, but they considered themselves too wise to hazard their money in so questionable a venture. In view of all the money that has been made by such men as Joe Murphy (the richest actor of the American stage), Andrew Mack, Chauncey Olcott and Denis O'Sullivan, it seems almost incredible that after having exhibited his pre-eminent fitness for the roles with which they were identified, Arthur Cunningham should have had to wait all these years for his launching. From his experience one is inclined to marvel at the obtuseness of theatrical managers. In the kind of Irish drama with which theatre-goers in this country love to be regaled it is essential that the hero should have a brogue, a rollicking manner and the gift of song. All these are among Cunningham's professional assets, and he is far more satisfying than the average star of Irish drama, since by his vocal ability he can compensate for many of the shortcomings which by reason of an inane plot and sickly sentimentalities are too frequently characteristic of the Irish plays written for consumption in this country. I am pleased to report that he is a big hit at the Valencia.

"The Chorus Lady"

In view of the zealous and persistent quest of character types to which playwrights devote much of their energies nowadays it is strange that we had to wait so long for the heroine of "The Chorus Lady" who, at the Van Ness, is now giving us a touch of life behind the scenes. This heroine is a very interesting and amusing character study, but the playwright has done something more than familiarize us with a type. He has written a rattling good play, redolent of the atmosphere in which the chorus girl moves, and he has sprinkled it with the argot of the wings and the sprightly witticisms of the Great White Way. The play, though it was originally a vaudeville sketch is not without substance, the germ idea being one susceptible of amplification and it has been treated with exceptional skill and ingenuity. It abounds in the elements of good comedy, and the performance is without a dull moment. James Forbes, the playwright, has handled his theme with something of the artistry that characterizes the dramaturgy of George Ade. The company, headed by Rose Stahl, has a plentitude of talent, and the star receives excellent support. Rose Stahl is every inch and every tone and every move the character she portrays.

Comedy at the Alcazar

"A Strenuous Life," which the Alcazar will present next week, will be remembered by San Francisco theatre-goers as the only local college farce that has ever been produced successfully on the professional stage.. It was written by Richard Walton Tully, who is better known by his collaboration with David Belasco in "The Rose of the Rancho." The farce was a great college hit and later was produced in several cities on the coast and in New York and Chicago. When played in the old Alcazar several years ago, it drew such crowded houses that the management has decided to revive the piece for Thanksgiving week. The farce is peculiar in that it does not depend upon topical and local hits for its success but keeps the average spectator laughing from start to finish. It deals with the affairs of Tom Harrington, captain of the football team, who has gotten into debt and numerous complication. His father, who has been supplying money generously, decides to visit Berkeley to see how well his son has been doing, and his arrival is very inopportune, as Tom has just got home from an escapade in San Francisco, where he played soldier in order to attend a banquet and met a young lady, who later appears on the scene at the same time as the father. Tom's endeavors to keep his father from finding out his bad record as a student and the young lady from learning that he is not the handsome soldier she fell in love with keeps the excitement and fun going through three acts. The play will be an event in local college circles, as Tully was a prominent man at the University of California during his college days, and his farce has long remained the standard of university farces. Next Monday night will be known as University of California night and a large number of theatre parties of old graduates will attend the reproduction of "A Strenuous Life." Wednesday night will be under-graduate night, when it is understood many students from the University of California and Stanford will attend.

Kolb and Dill's New Farce

"Weiner and Schnitzel, or We Won't Go Home Till Morning," is the title of the new play which Kolb and Dill will present this Monday night at the Princess Theatre. Aaron Hoffman, who wrote "Playing the Ponies," is the author of this new vehicle for the famous Dutch dialect comedians and it is the opinion of those who have witnessed the rehearsals that he has completely eclipsed all his previous efforts and that an entertainment which the audiences will be compelled to punctuate with shrieks of laughter will be the result. Weiner and Schnitzel (Kolb and Dill) are two wealthy brewers who through the mistake of a phrenologist named Reid Hedze, who is also a Justice of the Peace, marry two women of decided types. The phrenologist examines their bumps before the wedding, which takes place in the Statue of Liberty, and comes to the conclusion that the couple are unsuited to each other. Imbued with the spirit of romance the phrenologist weds them in the dark and purposely confuses the couples, marrying each of the women to the wrong man. Matrimony, instead of guiding Weiner and Schnitzel to bliss drives them to drink and after a prolonged spree they take refuge from the rain in a Turkish bath which was formerly a young lady's seminary. At the opening of the play the befuddled Dutchmen are discovered in shower baths and believing that the water which is dripping upon them is the rain from which they have escaped they have their umbrellas up for protection. A number of college girls and Mlle. Fleurette, their governess, who are unaware of the change of their seminary into a bath house, appear on the scene and having mislaid their keys gain entrance by the fire escape. Mlle. Fleurette has engaged two athletic instructors. M. Cartane Tierce and Kid Sluggem, an expugilist, and finding the two Germans on the premises she mistakes them for her new professors. Mrs. Wiener and Mrs. Schnitzel arrive on the scene and are thrown into the hot and steam rooms, where their husbands encounter them and a scene results which concludes the first act most divertingly. In the second act are complications as diverting as those in the first. The cast of Wiener and Schnitzel will be particularly effective. Among the new people who have been added to the company for this production are Harry Cashman, Sydney de Grey, Sarah Edwards and Marie Howe.

The Adele Verne Concerts

The first of the series of three concerts to be given by Adele Verne, one of the most popular pianists who ever appeared in this city, will be given Sunday afternoon at Christian Science Hall, when the following varied and interesting program will be given: Thirty-two variations,

ADELE VERNE, PIANIST

Beethoven; Scherzo, Mendelssohn; Melodie, Gluck-Sgambati; Rhapsodie, Op. 79, No. 2, Brams; Sonata in D minor, Scarlatti; Sonata in E major, Scarlatti; Waldscenen (Forest Scenes), Op. 82, Schumann; Eintritto (Entrance); Jager auf der Lauer (in Ambush); Einsame Blumen (Lonely Flowers); Verrufene Stelle (Haunted Spot); Freundliche Landschaft (Pleasing Landscape); Herberge (The Forest Inn); Vogel als Prophet (The Prophet Bird); Jagdlied (Hunting Song); Abschied (Farewell); Au Convent, Borodin; Polonaise in E major, Liszt. Miss Verne will probably give the Schumann "Forest Scenes" a reading that will never be forgotten, for her temperament is particularly suited to this class of work. The second concert will be given Thursday evening and the farewell on Saturday afternoon, the 28th. On next Tuesday afternoon, November 22, Miss Verne will play in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse at half past three. The date was originally set for Friday, but it was necessary to change it to Tuesday. The above program will be repeated at the Oakland concert.

"Paid in Full" Coming

The second and last week of Rose Stahl's engagement at the Van Ness Theatre will commence Monday night. Most deserving is the great success achieved by this star in James Forbes' unusual comedy, "The Chorus Lady," and the best indication of the same can be secured by noting the big advance sale of seats for the remaining performances. Already seats have been taken in large blocks for every presentation of the comedy up to and including Sunday night, the 29th, when it will be seen for the last time. The management of the Van Ness Theatre announces that it has been unable to arrange the bookings of that theatre so as to allow any more than a week's stay for the great dramatic triumph, "Paid in Full," which is to be seen for the first time in the West on Monday, November 30th. The seven evening and two matinee performances of the Eugene Walter play will pack the theatre to the doors, as the reputation of the production is of the best and reports from New York during its long run have been such as to awaken unusual interest among theatregoers. Seats go on sale next Thursday.

Arthur Hartmann—A Master Violinist

The first of the violinists to visit us this season will be Arthur Hartmann, a young virtuoso and composer who has just made a great success with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra as its first soloist of the season. Hartmann possesses every quality of a great artist—breadth of tone, great powers of interpretation and a simply marvelous technique which like such masters as Ysaye and Kreisler he simply uses as a means to an end. He has the reputation of being in every respect a learned and scholarly player as well as an exceptionally brilliant virtuoso. With Mr. Hartmann will come Alfred Calzin, a young American pianist who recently made his debut in Berlin and received most favorable attention from the world's greatest authorities. The first Hartmann concert will be given Sunday afternoon, November 29, when the artist will play Bruch's G minor concerto, an unaccompanied Bach "Prelude and Fugue," the brilliant fantasie on "Faust" by Wieniawski and three smaller works including a "Rhapsodie" of his own composition and his transcription of MacDowell's "Cradle Song." Mr. Calzin will play some Chopin works and numbers of Paul de Schloezzer, Glazounow and Liszt. An equally interesting program including the Mendelssohn concerto will be given Thursday night, December 3, and the last concert will be given Sunday afternoon, December 6. Complete programs may be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co's, where the sale of seats opens next Wednesday morning. On Friday afternoon, December 4, at 3:30 o'clock, Hartmann will play in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse.

Next Shaun Rhue

The last performance of "The Kerry Gow," Joseph Murphy's great play in which Arthur Cunningham is making such a hit, will take place at the Valencia Theatre Saturday afternoon and evening, and on Sunday afternoon "Shaun Rhue," its companion piece, will be staged on an elaborate scale. It was written by Mr. Murphy shortly after he achieved success in "The Kerry Gow." Mr. Cunningham, who will appear in the leading role, will have a number of the best Irish ballads to sing, including "The Donovans" and "Barney from Sweet Killarney." There will be a special matinee on Thanksgiving and on Monday evening "The Price of Money," for the benefit of the Protestant Episcopal Old Ladies' Home will be given. On Tuesday night the Corona Club will hold forth.

Valencia's Leading Lady

Miss Blanche Stoddard is to be the new leading lady at the Valencia Theatre, and no better selection could possibly be made. She is possessed of a charming personality, gracious ways and a decidedly artistic temperament, and wherever appearing has always been received with approbation. Her successes have been achieved in the principal cities of this country and she has been associated with many stars. With the Frohman companies she achieved a distinct success; with Nazimova she played a season in Ibsen roles at the Castle Square, in Boston; she starred, and in San Francisco, where she is a great social favorite, she was leading lady during a notably successful season at the Grand Opera House.

The Gold Medal for quality in the Whisky Section of the Franco-British Exhibition has been awarded to the "White Horse" Whisky, belonging to Mackie & Co., Distillers, Ltd., Islay and Glasgow. Ade's Latest

"Just Out of College," a comedy in three acts by George Ade, with original musical numbers by Frank L. Callahan and lyrics by Stanley Murphy, will be presented for the first time in this city at the American theatre next Sunday afternoon. This comedy has met with great success in the East and ran for an entire season at the Lyceum Theatre, New York City. The original production in its entirety will be seen at the American theatre under the direction of Gus Bothner and Robert Campbell. Bubbling over with good humor, sustained by a dramatic purpose, seasoned with spontaneous wit and enlivened with music and a chorus of pretty girls, "Just Out of College" should meet with approval by local theatregoers. In this comedy George Ade brings out the humorous side of the adventures of a young man, a college graduate, who must make his own living, handicapped with a lady love and with little beside a tennis racket, a college diploma and a smooth tongue. He persuades the father of the young lady to loan him $20,000 to invest. The old gentleman is a member of the pickle trust. The youth starts in to sell pickles on his own hook and with the aid of a business woman succeeds in forcing the father of the young lady to buy him out, thus showing keen business ability and thereby winning the girl's hand. The satire is complicated, filled with humorous situations and like "The College Widow" and the balance of the Ade successes, it is a character play and there is ample provision for every part. A well selected company of players will be seen in the American Theatre production, including William A. Mortimer, James Cooper, Lester Crawford, William Henderson, Dickie Delaro and Ethel Lloyd. In addition to the usual matinees there will be a special Thanksgiving Day matinee on Thursday.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The program at the Orpehum next week will be remarkable in many respects. An innovation which should successfully appeal to the public will be an entire comic opera condensed to the vaudeville time limit, with Geo. W. Leslie, a clever comedian, a company of high-priced principals and an attractive and capable chorus. The name of this musical offering is "The Naked Truth," and it is said to possess a witty and amusing libretto interspersed with tuneful lyrics. Considerable interest will center in the first vaudeville appearance here of Hall McAllister, a native of this city who is very popular in society and club circles. Some years ago he turned his back upon the law for the stage and he has succeeded in winning a position which ranks him as one of the most distinguished of the younger actors in this country. Mr. McAllister will present with the assistance of a very capable company a one-act play entitled "The Girl of the

JOHN E. MAHER

Who will return to the Alcazar Theatre in "A Strenuous Life" next Monday evening

Times" by Fred Niblo, which affords him a splendid opportunity of exhibiting his histrionic ability. Raymond and Caverly, those two very popular German comedians, who are unequaled in their particular line of vaudeville and whom an eastern writer has styled "The Wizards of Joy," will render songs and parodies of their own composition. Their funny dialogue in which they distort the English language always proves too much for the gravity of the audiences. The Four Orans will make their first appearance in this city in an acrobatic novelty called "On the Sea Shore," which promises to be something novel in this style of diversion. Next week will be the last of Welch, Mealy & Montrose; Lew Hawkins; Morrow and Schellberg and Staley and Birbeck in their marvelous protean act including "The Musical Blacksmiths." A new series of motion pictures will conclude an entertainment that bids fair to be delightful throughout.

A New Tenor

Lawrence Strauss of this city has just returned from a two years' trip abroad, where he has been studying in Paris, London and Berlin. He will give a concert early in December at Century Hall. Mr. Strauss is said to be an exceptionally interesting and talented singer.

In the Limelight

Louis James has started for this city with his massive production of "Peer Gynt," in which he has created nothing short of a sensation. The production was originally built for Richard Mansfield and two enormous railroad cars are necessary for its transportation across the continent. An immense amount of costuming is also carried. Nearly a hundred people appear in the production.

Darrell Standing, an English actor of great reputation, will be one of the new men at the Valencia Theatre.

"Ben Hur" will be seen at the Van Ness Theatre next month.

Miss Beatrice Nichols, from the Bush Temple, Chicago, will be the new ingenue at the Valencia Theatre.

"The Lion and the Mouse" will play a return engagement here.

Miss Helen Lakaye, sister of Wilton Lackaye, will be the second lady at the Valencia Theatre during the winter season.

Robert Warwick, the leading man of the Valencia Theatre stock company, returns with "Aristocracy."

Boy Life in a Logging Camp

"All Among the Loggers" is as good a book for boys as Stewart Edward White's "Blazed Trail" is for their fathers, and there is just enough difference between the methods of Maine and Michigan to make either book acceptable to the reader of the others. Writing for boys of thirteen and upward, Mr. Burleigh has omitted all reference to legal difficulties and camp roughness. Norman Carver, who plays the part of hero, "Among the Loggers" is a bright youth, an only son of seventeen years, attending school in Boston. One of the funny stunts of his frat was that of breaking into a private house, appropriating a suit of mail from the collection of its owner, and decorating the statue of the founder of their school with the stolen property. Dr. Horton did not take the same lenient view of the escapade as did the fraternity and its sympathizers. Instead of a creditable exhibition of nerve and a proof of mettle, he called it plain burglary, a state prison offense, and Master Carver and his mates were held to answer in a police tribunal. When General Carver discovered that Norman's penitence was more for being found out and exploited in the newspapers than for his crime, he decided that a complete change of environment and plenty of hard work would be the best antidote. Accordingly, having lumbering interests in Northern Maine, it was arranged that Norman should spend the remainder of the winter as clerk in one of the camps. The sights and scenes are all set forth just as they appeared to this city bred boy who has now a chance to discover with what hard labor some of his idle dollars have been accumulated. Norman Carver found his work in the logging camp such good fun, and his new companion, Fred the Cookee, such a fine fellow despite his lack of schooling, that he prevailed upon his father to permit him to go back in the spring to clerk for the drive, so a second volume is to follow, detailing the adventures of "Two Boys with Pickpole and Peavey." Coming just now, when the attention of the nation is turned toward the conservation of our remaining forest area. "All Among the Loggers" is an especially timely volume. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard, who have almost a monopoly of the juvenile field, are the publishers.

An Original Detective Story

In "The Distributors" Anthony Partridge offers something new in the line of mystery and detective stories. The reader, of course, can make a fairly good guess at what is going on, but this is an instance where the author and his clients form a partnership against society, and the initiates take their pleasure from the mystification of those outside the charmed circle. The foam of the very topmost wave of high society in England figure as the active agents. There were something like a dozen at first, of the select, who were banded together in an exclusive coterie for the study of esoteric philosophy and the "cultivation of their secondary selves." They were known as "The Ghosts," and the membership was limited. One of those whose curiosity was most ardent was an American heiress, a Miss Sophie van Heldt, and Miss Sophie, possessed of a fair share of native American impudence together with the aggressiveness which had won the fortune inherited, had no scruples against voicing her curiosity as openly as she would have discussed a common, ordinary stock. She wanted to know all about the "Ghosts," and know she would if human power could accomplish it. The leader of the coterie was Lord Evelyn Madrecourt. Associated with him were a King's councellor, a noted explorer, a dilletante scientist, an authoress of note, and one or two others. none of them past middle age, but all confessedly failures to themselves, people who had had too much of everything without sufficient exertion in the getting, who had lived too fast, exhausted their sensations, and now found the world a squeezed orange. Society at large was being treated to some surprising shocks and thrills, for a series of thefts of valuable gems took place one after the other. Scotland Yard and the metropolitan police were baffled and mystified, for no clue was forthcoming and no track of the missing jewels found. Several worthy charities, however, received anonymous gifts of large amounts and the world at large had its attention equally divided between interest in the identity of the thieves and speculation as to the origin of the mysterious benefactors. No one though to connect the two. Meanwhile, Miss Sophie Von Heldt had set an American agent on the track of the "Ghosts," expecting to come into possession of mysterious passwords, signs, grips and initiation ceremonies. Grunebar had at his services men of no scruples whatever and Sophie had plenty of money which she did not grudge, and had Grunebar but lived to tell what he knew there would have been sensation enough for both her and the rest of the world, for the "Ghosts," being all more or less abnormal to begin with, had simply grown more erratic by association, until they had all but lost their hold on sanity and could have argued themselves into the justice of any course they elected to follow. "The Ghosts" may be taken as a parable. The lengths to which they were led may be extreme, but they traveled the same high road which stretches before about one-half the clubs and societies which think they are improving their minds and cultivating their souls without first making sure they have the material on which to work. And, as Lord Evelyn said to the last, the amusing thing is that society takes them so seriously. Published by McClure.

the accompanying scientists are doubtful about Roosevelt will promptly be given the benefit of the doubt. This is where Curator Heller will be useful.

Of course there is no law, human or divine, nor any ordinance written or unwritten that prevents President Roosevelt from calling his hunting trip a "scientific expedition"; but it is a plain, ordinary, game slaughtering tour just the same, and the sycophancy of a sycophantic press can make of it nothing else. I wonder who suggested this latest vanity to the Strenuous One?

There seems to be an opinion abroad in this land that whatever Roosevelt says, goes; and this opinion seems to have extended to matters of science. He has declared that this hunting trip to Africa is a "scientific expedition"; and that settles the character of the expedition; as Another once said, "Let there be light"; and there was light. In the original instance, however, something was created that did not previously exist; while in this latest plagiarism of supreme prerogative something is sought to be achieved that has already been fully achieved. The zoology of the big game section of Africa has been skinned, stuffed and classified to a frazzle by scientists, who hunted the big game, not for the sport of killing it, but for the sole purpose of classifying it before it was skinned and stuffed. All the science of African fauna is now safely herded into the museums where it can be studied without the distraction of hunting it or the pleasure of killing it to corroborate the specimens already skinned, stuffed and classified.

Auto Notes

What promises to be the best piece of road for motorists in the State is now being built between Sacramento and Lake Tahoe. According to C. R. Parmenter of the Pioneer Automobile Company, who drove a Chalmers-Detroit car one-half of the two hundred mile non-stop motor test in Sacramento election day, the new road promises to be the finest in the State. "The three miles that are already finished are the best that I ever drove over," said the local saleman. "The surface is just like asphalt and the wheels of the car meet no resistance whatever. In fact, the road when completed would undoubtedly prove a fine place for a road race. I used the short stretch that is now completed to turn off a great many of the miles I drove in the 200 mile non-stop test, and the fact that I could turn the car loose for the whole distance of three miles, proved a time-saver in the long test." The new road, however, is the only one leading out of the capital that can be used by motor tourists and most of the owners of motor cars are working hard for the early completion of the Lake Tahoe road.

Mr. P. C. Hale, the well known dry goods merchant of this city, has just returned from a very successful trip through Mexico in his Model D '08 Franklin touring car. He reports covering about 1700 miles and advises that the roads in Mexico are exceptionally good. No adjustments of any kind were made on the trip and the tires were not repumped after leaving this city.

The 1909 White steam car has arrived, and as a result the local branch of the White Company is about the busiest place in town. The big garage was crowded all day yesterday with people who came to see the car that has proven one of the sensations of the year in automobile circles. Many of the interested ones were from the country and they made the trip especially to see the new White. Among the earliest arrivals were E. B. Waterman and a party of twelve prospective buyers from Fresno. The demonstrator which arrived Sunday is the Model O, the smaller of the two models turned out by the White factory for 1909. The car is rated at 20 horse power and seats five passengers. It has been generally pronounced the handsomest car ever made by the well known steam car makers. It is the straight line type, and the effect is one of graceful lightness and serviceable strength. In quality of workmanship the car more than lives up to the reputation for excellence already established by the machines made by the White company. The new car is equipped with a distillate tank. In addition to the economy in the cost per gallon distillate will run 20 per cent farther on a gallon than will gasoline, thus reducing the cost of automobile operation or fuel about 75 per cent or one-fourth the present cost. In addition to the new burner and pilot light, which are great improvements over the previous models, the engine on the new White has only one-half the number of parts of the former engine, the crank shaft is a solid drop forging and by using only two very heavy bearings does away with the possibility of getting the bearings out of alignment. The new car has the same horse-power as the 1908 Model L 20 horsepower; and as the model O weighs 500 pounds less than the model L and has a very much improved engine, it is reported to be the best hill climber and the liveliest and snappiest car ever turned out at any price. It will sell for $2000, which is $500 less than last year's model, notwithstanding the many improvements.

An automobile which has attracted more than usual attention on the streets of San Francisco during the past week is the Buick "White Streak" which W. F. Woods drove from Chicago, Ill., to this city. Mr. Woods purchased the "White Streak" in Chicago and after removing the single rumble seat fitted a tonneau to the car. The start was made from the "Windy City" with Los Angeles as the final objective point, the journey having been undertaken for the benefit of Mrs. Woods' health. The party was composed of Mr. and Mrs. Woods and twelve-year-old daughter. The actual mileage covered between Chicago and Ogden was 2083 and the account kept by Mr. Woods of the cost of running his car shows the expenditure of $22.50 for gasoline, $10.45 for cylinder oil, $3.90 for heavy oil and the purchase of one casing, an average cost of two and a half cents per mile.

The question often arises whether non-stop runs or reliability tests are really an advantage to the selling of motor cars. The real value of such tests is seldom appreciated by even the dealers or manufacturers themselves, as the great amount of publicity given the event by the newspapers does a great deal to interest people who would otherwise never think of purchasing a motor car. That this is so is shown by the remarkable sale of the Chalmers-Detroit thirty horse-power runabout, which made a pefect score in the election Sweepstakes non-stop run in this city. Among the many motor owners and others who were interested in the event was A. J. Welsh, a prominent automobilist of this city, who visited the salesrooms of the Pioneer Automobile Company with the sole purpose of seeing the car that had made such a good showing in the non-stop run. After examining the car less than five minutes, Welsh handed E. P. Brinegar a check, jumped in the machine and drove away remarking that if the car could run over four hundred miles without an adjustment it was good enough for him. The sale was one of the quickest ever made by the Pioneer Automobile Co.

Madam Eva Fay, who is exhibiting her wonderful clairvoyant powers at a local theatre, is an enthusiastic White owner. She has been driving a White steamer car for three years, and has a steamer of her own at home, but while she is traveling she always rents a car for her exclusive use in each city where she is billed to play. She has been supplied with a 20 horse-power White touring car by the White garage of this city, and she can be seen driving in it every day. She scorns the service of a chauffeur. as she thoroughly understands the mechanism of the car.

E. G. Schmiedell, of Mailliard & Schmiedell & Co., of this city, has placed an order with the Consolidated Motor Car Co. for a '09 Pope Hartford Model S touring car, painted French gray and upholstered in green leather, fully equipped. Delivery is to be made about December 1st.

Miss Franc Merchants has just received her Packard 18 '09 touring car from Cuyler Lee.

The six-cylinder Thomas Flyer, probably the fastest car on the coast, arrived this week at the Pioneer Automobile Company. The car, which is finished in red, is along the same racy lines as the latest foreign cars and is rated at seventy miles an hour with seven passengers. The six cylinders, which are the same size as in the four-cylinder 60 horse-power cars, develop 80 horse-power. Although one of the highest powered cars on the coast, the new machine weighs only 4150 pounds. R. F. Ogden, who had placed an order for the car, upon being informed that his machine had arrived, called at the Pioneer Automobile Company's salesrooms and said: "Where is my car? I will give you just two hours to get her ready to travel, but just to show you my heart is in the right place, I will give you a check now for the car." He got the car within the time specified.

Last Saturday was the wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. P. E. Bowles, and on this day Mrs. Bowles was presented by Mr. Bowles with a Packard '09 touring car.

M. J. Nightingale drove to this city Friday to attend the University football game. The round trip from Oakdale was made in his two-cylinder Buick touring car.

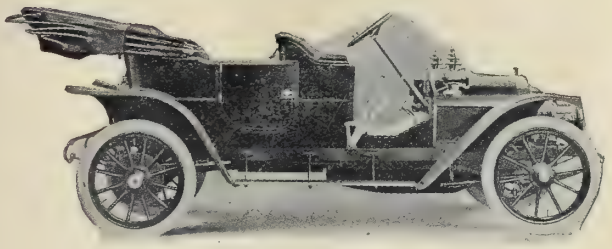
The Consolidated Motor Car Co. report the sale of '08 Franklin Model G touring car to Gladding, McBean & Co., of this city.

Mr. and Mrs. William Woods and daughter spent the week touring Marin and Sonoma counties in their Buick "White Streak."

Frederick J. Butler, the well-known stage manager of the Alcazar Theatre, is the latest purchaser of an Oldsmobile. The theatrical motor enthusiast placed his order this week with the Pioneer Automobile Company for a 1909 Olds touring car for immediate delivery.

The Consoldated Motor Car Co. report the arrival of a complete line of Franklin demonstrators, including the Model G 18 horse-power, the Model D 24 horse-power, and the Model H 42 horse-power.

Mr. A. H. Marten of San Jose has just received the first '09 Packard 18 runabout to be delivered on the coast by Cuyler Lee.



W. W. Bryan of Oakland, has purchased a '08 Pope Hartford touring car from the Consolidated Motor Car Co.

TOWN TALK

CALIFORNIA STATE

THE TALK OF THE TOWN

is the return of "Sunny Jim" and his best of all breakfast foods---the original flaked wheat food that you always liked

"FORCE"

It was always good enough, but now it is better than ever. Made of the choicest wheat that grows, steam-cooked, malted, rolled in thin flakes and baked until it is crisp and delicious.

It pays to Talk when you have something to say. Get the Talking habit by eating a food that is full of Talk. Eat "FORCE" every day in the week no matter what you eat on other days---and you will be at the top-notch of mental vigor and physical power. It is the pre-digested energy of the whole wheat combined with barley malt.

Always crisp it before serving it by pouring it into a pan or earthenware dish and warming it in oven; then serve in large dish with cream, piling the flakes on one side of the dish and pouring the milk in on the other side, dipping the flakes as eaten.

Hearst and Roosevelt Meet as Friends

The whirligig of time brings its reconciliations as well as its revenges. For example ponder the case of Mr. William R. Hearst and Mr. Theodore Roosevelt. According to the Associated Press these eminent citizens were engaged the other day in a social chat in the White House for half an hour. Mr. Hearst was the President's guest. What matters of moment were discussed we know not, but it is fair to presume that the election of Mr. Taft was touched upon and mutual felicitations exchanged apropos the happy event. During the campaign it was suspected that Mr. Hearst's zeal was inspired with concern for Mr. Taft's interests rather than enthusiasm for the Independence League, but as it was generally understood that the President and Mr. Hearst were irreconcilable foes the suspicion never became widespread. It was believed they would rather pour the milk of concord into the lower regions and uproar the universal peace than enter into partnership even if it promised the justification of confounding their mutual enemy. But now that we know they are friends, that old sores have been healed, and that the deadly breach has become a thing of the dead past, perhaps we may be justified in describing as masterly teamwork some of the historic coups of the months of September and October. Mr. Hearst rendered valuable service to the Republican party, not by the votes that were diverted from Bryan to Hisgen but by his exposure of the Nebraskan's insincerity and shiftiness, and especially by breaking the legs of the high horse ridden by the Hon. Samuel Gompers. Until Hearst tackled the mighty chief of organized labor and ridiculed his lofty pretensions the politicians deemed it wise to treat that blatant demagogue with much deference. His person was regarded as sacred. The supposition was that organized labor would resent criticism of its vociferous leader. Though Gompers had espoused the cause of the Peerless One no Republican orator dared to charge him with treachery and disloyalty to his friend the President. It was not until Hearst charged that Gompers had proved false to the interests of labor and made it clear that the autocrat of the unions was only a tin god that the bold and truculent Teddy plucked up the courage to gird at his old friend and protege.

The Objection to Root

It is somewhat curious that notwithstanding the reconciliation of Mr. Hearst and the President, there has been no abatement of the distinguished journalist's vindictiveness toward Elihu Root. It has been decreed by the President that his Secretary of State shall be the next Senator from New York. Mr. Roosevelt, it appears, having made a President, feels that the lesser achievement which he contemplates is quite within the compass of his powers. But Mr. Hearst objects to Mr. Root ostensibly on the ground that he is morally unfit, having once been engaged in pointing the way whereby rich men might evade the law. Of course Mr. Hearst's real reason is that he has not forgiven Mr. Root for obtruding himself in a State campaign for the purpose of persuading the people of the unfitness of a certain distinguished candidate for Governor. But obviously it is unjust to Mr. Root to be vindictive toward him after having forgiven Mr. Roosevelt, for it was at the instigation of the latter as was admitted at the time, that the Secretary threw himself into the campaign and denounced Mr. Hearst. The objection that should now be urged against Root is the one that is being urged by the New York Sun: that he is being forced upon the people of New York by the President of the United States, who ought to be attending strictly to his own business, if not disciplined by the people, for using his powers in a way that is highly prejudicial to the best interests of the country. But if Mr. Hearst were to urge this objection it would give offense to his exalted friend at Washington.

A Plea for Peace

We cannot praise too warmly the sentiments expressed by the Monitor, the official organ of the Catholic archdiocese of San Francisco, with reference to the deplorable turmoil in which we have been weltering for two years. Long have we felt and frequently have we asserted that nothing is to be gained by mutual recrimination and reproach. We believe that the oil and wine of the good Samaritan have far greater curative powers than the rage that scourges and the anger that brands. So we appreciate the amiable sentiments expressed in the Monitor; and considering that this city bears the name of the most perfect exponent of the gentleness and charity of the Christian tradition, we feel that the sermon which has hit the mark of the occasion emanated from a most appropriate source. Gently, without severity, the Monitor has rebuked the preachers of the city who have made shipwreck of their charity and become thorough-paced sticklers for their passions and prejudices; the misguided moralists of the pulpit who would draw up in deadly array against the courts all the hatred and ignorance of the mob. The Monitor proclaims the importance of abating turbulence and reminds us that in the fierce contests of contending factions, when human nature is stirred by such mighty agents as indignation and rage the understanding rarely deliberates. It urges us to respect those who administer our laws and counsels us to practice moderation in speech and in writing, and, in all personal intercourse to discourage the expression of personal bitterness and hatred. These are sentiments from which no man will dissent who has the interests of San Francisco at heart or who is animated by the principles which are essential to good citizenship.

Tampering With Justice

Perhaps the keenness of our appreciation of the Monitor's sentiments is due to the circumstance that they have inspired most of our animadversions on the things that have been done in this city in the name of justice within the last two years. We have objected principally and persistently to the efforts that have been made to intimidate our higher courts and to blacken the character of the judges therein. If we have ever been intemperate in our censure of any judge it was because we could not control the indignation which he excited by the foulness of his act in impugning the motives of the higher court which could not be intimidated into acquiescing in his perversion of the law. It is our opinion and one to which we have repeatedly given utterance, that more important than the punishment of men who have polluted a municipal government is the conscientious administration of justice, and that no crime should be more vehemently reprobated than that of persuading a minister of justice to deny an accused person, however strong the proof of his guilt, any of the rights which he is guaranteed by the laws of his country. The enormtiy of this crime lies not in the injustice that may be done to an individual but in the pollution of the magistrate who has dishonored that glorious and beautiful robe by which, in the language of Bishop Horne, he is expected "to render his tribunal a fit emblem of that eternal throne of which justice and judgment are the habitation."

Fruitless Admonition

Of the preachers of San Francisco, those who have poured out their wrath as from teeming and exhaustless fountains and contributed with all their lungs to the feverish unreason that has dominated many members of the community, the Monitor says that while they seem to have received some special inspiration for their purpose "from their language their inspiration does not appear to have come from a God of justice and mercy." From time to time we too have taken occasion to utter precisely the same suggestion with respect to our cocksure and somewhat vociferous pulpiteers. We have done our best to persuade them of the error of their attitude, our main objection to their conduct being that they were seconding the efforts of men who were trying to substitute an inflamed public sentiment for the law. Now this, we conceive, is bad business for a minister of the gospel of Christianity to be in. It is a mistake, a grievous one, to suppose that public sentiment is higher than the law in this country. The law, it is true, is an expression of public sentiment, but it embodies not the sentiment or whim of the moment; nor is it to be interpreted by the multitude in mass-meeting assembled. The interpretation of the law is a function reserved for the judiciary; and it is not conducive to public interest to influence the judiciary by clamor. As Justice Story has said "government is never so oppressive or mischievous as when the actual administration of justice is dependent upon caprice or favor, upon the will of rulers or the influence of popularity"; and he added: "When power becomes right it is of little consequence whether decisions rest upon corruption or weakness, upon the accidents of chance or deliberate wrong." It was because some of the congenital agitators of the pulpit yielded to the persuasions of the personally conducted Graft Prosecution organs and sought to intimidate the Appellate Court that we mildly censured them and undertook to guide them that they might "see clear and think straight." But most of the preachers who have been seconding the efforts of the lay moralists resent wholesome admonition and instruction. They have yet to learn that it is the man without argument who is most impatient of contradiction and who is given to furious explosions, radiating no light save from his inflamed countenance. They have made it quite apparent that they are irrational partisans, that they have lost their temper and are incapable of logical discussion. All that they care to know is that crimes have been committed and that so far efforts to punish them have proved futile. Unquestionably this is a bad state of affairs. Nay, it is a disgrace to San Francisco. But instead of falling into the fulminating style of the wrathful Hebrew prophets and propagating slander with a view to silencing critics, would it not be well to inquire why the criminals have not been punished? In the hope of stimulating inquiry among the honest men of the pulpit we beg leave to ask this question: Is it not asserted today that the prosecution has failed because the venal press has misled public opinion? Assuming that that question will be answered in the affirmative, we will follow it up with this one: By what authority is it assumed that men charged with crime in this country must be tried at the bar of public opinion? Incidentally we should like to know what ought to be the judgment of an honest citizen with respect to the conduct of men engaged in the prosecution of accused persons who demand that the public shall make the force of their opinion felt at the bar of justice. If we are under a misapprehension as to what that judgment ought to be then the readers of Town Talk should reject as sophistries all that has been urged in these columns on the subject of the graft prosecution.

A Word Defined

There are divers definitions in the dictionaries of the meaning of the word "assassination," a word that recently has served various purposes in the controversies arising among the citizens of San Francisco. As commonly understood an assassination involves the cruel, cold-blooded, cowardly murder of a human being; but it may also be applied to an attempt to murder in the manner thus described. The word is of Arabic origin and contains the history of the religious and military sect founded in Persia about the year 1090 by Hassan ben Sabbah. Secret murder in unquestioning compliance with the will of their chief was the distinguishing feature of the cult, and the practice of stupefying the instruments of this murderous propaganda with hashish to give them courage for the perpetration of their horrible crimes, is believed to have also given a name to their peculiar method of spreading the tenets of their "faith," one article of which was to the effect that the Holy Spirit resided in their chief and that his inspiration proceeded directly from God. There is a psychology of words, which the adepts call "shades of meaning." The Arabic word hashshasin," or "hashishiyyin" is a term that may be translated "hashish-eaters." It is the specific application of the word that gives it a hideous complexion. An assassin is not necessarily a hashish-eater; but the hashish-eater may be, potentially, an assassin. It is not the root-meaning that conveys the horror of the word; it is the association of ideas engendered by knowledge of the historical use of the word that incites a shudder of terror and abhorrence. Its force is emphasized by its sound, which is like the hissing of a venomous serpent in the very act of striking.

Newspaper Assassins

By extension of the original meaning of the noun "assassin" and the verb "assassinate" we frequently apply the term to any action that blights or destroys treacherously or wantonly, with malice and malignancy of heart. It is accurate, therefore, to speak of "an assassin of character," or of "a reputation that was foully assassinated." This is what has apparently happened to the Rev. Payson Young. His character has been done to death by a woman's reckless tongue in conspiracy with the unscrupulous newspapers of this city. His reputation has been cruelly and malignantly assassinated. He has been compelled to resign his position as rector of the church over which he had charge; his health has been shattered under the shock of the horrible accusations that were spoken and published against him; and seemingly he has no redress against those who have thrust the daggers of their envenomed lies into his heart—he is an outcast among men, a derelict on the sea of circumstance. If the Rev. Payson Young had been the man that his contemners said he was, these accusers would now be facing the bar of justice to answer a charge of criminal libel; they would be on their defense to show why they uttered and printed libels upon this man which they now acknowledge they cannot substantiate; libels that, as the evidence now indicates, were never based upon even the shadow of a fact and never bore even the semblance of truth. But the Rev. Payson Young is a broken man; he has not the brute courage to arraign his enemies and to force them to an accounting. His assassins will probably escape. He is but an incident in the daily "news"; his character, a helpless victim of the newspaper assassins, is in the morgue of dead reputations—and there will be no inquest.

Conviction by Accusation

Here we have a vivid and satisfying example of accusation without proof, and the result of such accusation. The Rev. Payson Young was accused, and that was sufficient for the newspaper reading public of San Francisco. But the Rev. Payson Young is not a singular instance of the effect of a mere accusation upon the credulity of this community. It has come to a pass in this city that not only is an accusation equivalent to proof of guilt in the minds of the citizens, but any denial, however probable or plausible, is confirmation of the original accusation. "If the accused were not guilty, he would not be so glib to deny it." This is the attitude of a considerable section of this community, now loud in its demand that the accused shall be "speedily" punished for the crimes of which they are accused. It is no longer a rule of law, apparently, that a prosecution shall prove its charges—the defendant must prove his innocence; and he must furnish this proof without delay and wholly divested of the "technicalities" that a wise legislation founded in centuries of experience has thrown about the defendant accused of crime. So it was in the good old days of Venice when the Council of Ten was supreme and anonymous assassins denounced their victims to torture and death through the lion's mouth. Comparisons are instructive as well as odious; but they are inevitable when we consider that history has a habit of repeating itself, and that human nature has not changed for the better during the past millennium.

Only Genius Is Free

Complaint is frequent in our little world of letters because the dollar-chasing, dollar-getting publishers compel the authors and other literateurs to "write down to the level of the reader." It is urged with perennial insistence that no author or literateur should be hampered by the commercial requirements of the publishing business. There is a well-defined opinion abroad in this little world of letters that each author and each literateur should be permitted to write as he pleases irrespective of the demand of commercial literature that he shall write to please, and that what he writes shall please the widest possible area of readers. Without wholly denying the validity of this perpetual protest from the ladies and gentlemen of ephemeral literature, we venture to ask a very simple question, which may admit of an equally simple answer: Why don't you write as you please, and tell the publishers to go hang if they object to what you have pleased to write? The answer from the little world of letters is immediate, spontaneous and unanimous: If we don't write what pleases the publishers they will not print what we write. This is probably true in the case of those authors and literateurs who are complaining. They are, indeed, probably subordinate to the tyranny of the publishers—and that is not their fault. Why? Because the authors and literateurs are not big enough to dominate the publishers. It is common literary history that genius in letters not only commands its price nowadays, but that it dictates its terms to the publishers servilely acquiescent of every detail of the treaty. Take the case of Kipling for one example. Away back in 1902 Frank Moore Colby lamented that "there is no sign in Kipling's writings that he has ever learned anything from his critics or made any concessions to his public's demands. Take it or leave it has been his attitude from the first." Mr. Colby's complaint would have more point to it if he, or for that matter, any other critic, or any appreciable portion of the public which takes upon itself the liberty of making demands on an author had the remotest idea of wanting any definite thing or even of knowing what it did want. To be sure, as W. D. Howells once put it in the mouth of one of his characters, there is a vast difference between not knowing what one does want and knowing what one does not, but the fact remains that the author who attempts to please the public is apt to find himself in the condition of the old man of the ancient fable who in his effort to appease the mob not only failed to please any one but lost his donkey into the bargain. Perhaps it has been a fortunate circumstance for Kipling that he has not been obliged to transform himself into a journalistic hack writer in order to keep the domestic pot a-boil. When the butcher, the baker and the candlestick maker must be appeased from the products of the pen it is a bad business policy to say the least, which will counsel a man to venture abroad into fresh and untried fields. It is safer to keep to the treadmill and grind the weary grist that is marketable at the fixed price. Between wondering whether publishers will accept, critics approve and the public purchase, there is not much room left for originality and by the time the habit of watching for the weather signals is formed the mind has lost its poise. More than one writer has confessed that he has forgotten how to write. It is generally conceded that though newspaper work is the best preparation for literary occupation, the writer who does not make his escape by the time he is thirty is unlikely ever to emerge. It was Bernard Shaw who said: "Those who can do; they who can't criticize," and some other philosopher has added to this the cryptic clause that "those who can do neither teach." Perhaps Kipling has shown his greatest wisdom in his complete indifference to what the public demands. There is nothing that piques curiosity like apparent apathy. If Kipling had continued to write stories of Indian life, as the critics advised him, they would long ago have turned and rent him for his monotony. If he had yielded to the fashion of the hour and given them romances of the Zenda order, they would have regretted his loss of originality. If he had turned his attention altogether to machinery they would have wanted men and women. As it is he probably pleases himself, and each successive production has the novelty of a sealed package. It is an interesting speculation to take up the back numbers of any literary periodical and note the names and portraits of those who are hailed as new stars on the horizon. Perhaps one in twenty has attained some prominence, but the vast majority, who are simply twinkling a little by reflected lights, go out as completely as a candle which is quenched. Kipling is a comparatively young man yet. Time and again it has been heralded abroad that his star has set forever. He is as heedless of guide posts and fences today as he was when his stories first came before the public, and as far as his critics are concerned, one of his own lines is applicable: "He travels the fastest who travels alone." And the Kipling example furnishes ample proof that genius has not the slightest difficulty in coming to its own and holding it in spite of the publishers and in defiance of the dictum that all authors and literateurs shall "write down to the level of the reader."

A Letter From Ina Coolbrith

Containing a Clear, Concise and Final Statement from the Poet Concerning Her Relations As a Beneficiary With Those Who Were Instrumental in Assisting Her at a Time of Need.

Editor Town Talk:

Dear Sir,—My attention has been called to some words of the "Spectator"—"A Poet's Income"—in your columns of November 14th, with regard to the Spinners' Benefit Fund and myself. While I thank you for your kind championship of my cause I ask the favor of a little space in your paper in which to speak for myself, and thus make impossible any further misunderstanding of this affair, unhappy to both sides, and end it, so far as I am concerned, I hope forever.

First let me correct a mistake. The honor paid me by the San Jose Women's Club had no connection with the Spinners. They are distinct organizations.

Two ladies, as a committee from the Spinners' Club, waited upon me immediately after the disaster of April, 1906, with the proposition to publish a volume of their (the Spinners') stories if I would accept the income therefrom; this to pass on at my death to others. This proposition was the only one made me, and the only time I was consulted. My name was given to the project, "The Ina Coolbrith Fund," later changed to "The Spinners' Benefit Fund." Later on the Spinners' own work which was to have composed the book was set aside for the stories solicited and obtained from leading Pacific Coast authors, as per your article of November 14th, in my name, with a dedicatory poem to myself by George Sterling. "The Spinners Book of Fiction" was not published until October, 1907. The Spinners got a royalty of only 20 cents; the interest on this royalty—about one cent per copy—was to come to me. The Spinners increased their profit on some 400 or 500 copies purchased by them outright from the publisher and resold, but I do not know the exact figures. Nor do I know the disposition of the royalties; not having been consulted I could hardly have given the "unqualified expressions of disapproval" with which I am credited. In addition to the book, the Spinners solicited cash contributions amounting to $800, to which they added $200 of their own club fund. The additional $140 said to have also been given was repaid from the first book sales. With the $1000 thus obtained they purchased a five per cent railroad bond. The interest on this bond—$50 per annum, or $4.16 per month, beginning September, 1907—was paid to me. I had nothing from the book until September 5th last, when I received a check for $15.80, interest on the royalties. This was two days after the cruel attack upon me in the Call of September 3rd, which is the direct cause of this present statement, and—as the only possible course left to me—the return of all monies received from the Spinners' Benefit Fund—just $90.80—and my resignation from the organization.

The Spinners publicly accuse my friends and self of "demanding that they sell their bond and turn the proceeds, together with the book royalties, over to me." I am aware that many of my friends, Mrs. Atherton among the number, have thought that as my misfortunes were made the opportunity and my name the means for the collection of both bond money and book material, and as the results, from no fault or effort on the Spinners' part, had proved so wholly inadequate to any material aid, that the sums which they had acquired should be divided with me. On the "other side" the Spinners claim that their fund, as finally formulated, is a perpetual one, for the benefit of others as well as myself, and therefore they cannot legally give over any part of the whole. Nor would I have them do so, though the legal aspect seems to afford no protection to the beneficiary. Now, I distinctly affirm that I have never made, nor instigated any demand upon the Spinners for any part of their fund, capital or interest. Nor have I borrowed from them. Because of the almost constantly advertised "Ina Coolbrith Benefits," the public naturally believes that all my needs, past, present and to come, have been and are covered by the Benefit Fund. This belief has hurt me greatly as it has tended to frustrate my personal efforts to reestablish myself. The correction of it has long been imperative. The only request I have ever made or meant to make of the Spinners has been that they publish, for this purpose, a statement of just what they had accomplished and the exact sum of money paid me. This would have made any trouble impossible; and this request, and the fact that I denied receipt of benefits not received are all the Spinners can truthfully bring against me. If there are other reasons for their attitude I am in ignorance of them, and they should have made them known and given me an opportunity to answer before condemning and executing me.

In answer to the Spinners' other specifications, it is true that when shelterless from the fire I found temporary shelter with Mrs. John H. Boalt, who made me welcome, not as a Spinner, but as my most intimate friend of twenty-five years' standing. Not as a "Spinner," but because the Spinners fund was still in abeyance, Mrs. Atherton brought about, under the auspices of the Bohemian Club, the "Authors' Reading" (which netted, out of all the "benefits" in the field, the only sum which came to me personally, unreservedly and unlabeled with the sign of the coffin, and which I have used towards a home. Nor did any Spinner's sole efforts obtain for me aid from the relief funds. It is a mistake that "the Spinners made arrangements for me to live comfortably at Carmel-by-the-Sea." Chiefly through the interest of a resident member of the Women's Press Association, a lot for life was offered me if a house could be built upon it. For physical and financial reasons this was not done. The "library position" which I would not take had a hazardous salary of $10 a month, collected from the citizens, and I was told "I must not disturb the incumbent." It is true I wished to remain in San Francisco, "the city of my love and my desire," and that I preferred Russian Hill as my old-time home, and because it was the most economical part of the city to live in. I did not know that these were faults meriting public criticism. As for the "failure to induce me to add something by my own effort to what had been given me," as no one of those for whom my accuser acts as sponsor had made inquiry as to what I had done or was doing, I fail to understand upon what authority such assertion was based. I am known to be no drone in the hive. Since early girlhood I have worked hard for my own support, and for a large portion of the time for that of others as well. To attempt such daily routine positions as were mine for nearly thirty years was not possible, since for three-fourths of the last two years I have been unable, from inflammatory rheumatism to cross my threshold, but I have done all I could find to do.

I had determined to make no public answer to the Spinners' attack upon me, but circumstances resulting from that attack compel me to do so. The whole matter involved is so pitifully small that but for its disastrous results to myself and the unhappy comment to which it has subjected the Spinners, it would be ridiculous. No words can express my sorrow for it all. I realize that the Spinners worked hard to secure the money for the bond and the stories for the book, but they have their reward in the possession of both. I am not "inappreciative of any effort in my behalf" (though resulting in no benefit to me) nor of any kindness received from any source. But neither did I give my name over to the Benefit Fund to have it pauperized, and that I should be left at the last with my only opportunity lost, and be covered with unmerited shame and humiliation.

There was once a Man who preached a Sermon on a Mount. It might be well for all of us to recall that portion contained in St. Matthew vi, 1, 2, 3, 4.

The Dwarf's Bargain; For the Love of Gold

By J. H. Pierce

The yoke of poverty galled him exceedingly, and he hated his task-mistress with a most rancorous hatred. As he climbed up or down the dripping ladders, descending from sollar to sollar towards the level where he worked, he would set his teeth grimly that he might not curse aloud—an oath underground being an invitation to the evil one. And when he was at work in the dreary level, he brooded so moodily over his bondage to poverty, that he desired to break from it at any cost.

"I'd risk a lem for its weight in gowld; darned ef I wedn'!" he muttered savagely, as he dug at the stubborn rock with his pick. He could hear the sound of blasting in other levels—the explosions traveling to him in a muffled boom—and above him, for he was working beneath the bed of the ocean, he could faintly distinguish the grinding sea as the huge waves wallowed and roared across the beach.

"I'm sick to death o' this here life," he grumbled. "I'd give a haand or a' eye for a pot o' suvrins. Iss, I'd risk more than that," he added, darkly, letting the words ooze as if under his breath.

At that moment his pick detached a piece of rock which came crashing down on the floor of the level, splintering into great jagged fragments as it fell. He started back with an exclamation of uncontrollable surprise. The falling rock had disclosed the interior of a cavern whose outlines were lost in impenetrable gloom, but which here and there in a vague fashion, as it caught the light of the candle flickering in his hat, seemed to sparkle as if its walls were crusted with silver.

"Lor' Jimmeny, this es bra' an' queer! he gasped.

As he leaned on his pick, peering into the cavern with covetous eyes, but with a wildly-leaping heart, he was aware of an odd movement among the shadows.

It was a certain squat, humpbacked blotch, that was sprawling blackly beside a misshapen block, was either wriggling on the floor as if trying to stand upright . . . . . or else there was something wrong with his eyes. He stared at the wavering gloom in the cavern, with its quaint, angular spalshes of glister, where heads of quartz and patches of mundic caught the light from the unsteady candle, and presently he was certain that the shadows were alive.

Most of all, he was sure that the little humpbacked oddity had risen to its feet and was a veritable creature: an actual uncouth, shambling grotesque, instead of a mere flat blotch of shadow. Up waddled the little humpback to the hole in the wall, where Joel stood staring, leaning on his pick.

"What can I do for 'ee, friend?" asked the humpback, peering at the grimy, half naked miner, with his little ferrety eyes glowing luminously.

Joel moistened his lips with his tongue before he answered. "Nawthin', please sir," he gasped out, quakingly. "Nonsense, man!" said the humpback, pleasantly, rubbing his hands gleefully together as he spoke. And Joel noticed that the fingers, though long and skinny, were adorned with several sparkling rings. "Nonsense, my man! I'm your friend—if you'll let me be. O never mind my hump, if that's frightening you," and the lean brown face puckered into a smile. "Come! In what way can I oblig' 'ee, friend? I can grant you any wish you like. Say the word—and it's done! Just think what you could do if you had heaps of money, now—piles of suvrins in that owld chest in your bedroom, instead o' they two-an'-twenty suvrins you now got heeded away in the skibbet." Joel stared at the speaker with distended eyes, the great beads of perspiration gathering on his forehead. "How did 'ee come to know they was there?"

"I knaw more than that," said the humpback, laughing. "I could tell 'ee a thing or two, b'leeve me, if I wanted to. Wedn 'ee like they two-an'-twenty suvrins in the skibbet made a hundred-an'-twenty?" asked the humpback, insinuatingly. "Iss, by Gosh, I should!"

"Then gi' me your hand on it, cumraade, an' you shall have 'em!" "Here goes, then!" said Joel.

The humpback seized the proffered hand in an instant, covering the grimy fingers with his own lean claws. "Oh, le' go! le' go!" shouted Joel.

The humpback grinned; his black eyes glittering.

"I waan't be niggardly to 'ee, cumraade,' 'said he. "Every drop o' blood you choose to shed for the purpose shall turn into a golden suvrin for 'ee—there!"

"Darn 'ee! thee ben an' run thy nails in me—see!"

And Joel showed a drop of blood oozing from his wrist. "Try the charm, man! Wish! Hold un out, and say, Wan!"

Joel held out his punctured wrist mechanically. "Wan!" There was a sudden gleam, down dropped a sovereign; a bright gold coin that rang sharply.

"Try agen!" said the humpback, grinning delightedly. Joel stooped first to pick up the coin, and bit it eagerly. "Ay, good Gosh! 'tes gowld, sure 'nuff!"

"Try agen!" said the humpack. "Make up a pile!" Joel held out his wrist and repeated the formula. "Wan!" And another coin clinked at his feet.

He leaned on his pick, and kept coining his blood eagerly, till presently there was quite a little pile at his feet.

The humpback watched him intently for a time; but Joel appeared to be oblivious of his presence; and the squat little figure stealthily disappeared. The falling coins kept chiming melodiously, till presently the great stalwart miner had to lean against the wall of the level to support himself. So tired as he was he had never felt before. But give over his task he either could not, or would not. The chink of the gold pieces he must hear if he died for it. He looked down at them greedily. "Wan! —wan!—wan!"

Presently he tottered and fell over on his heap.

At the same moment the halting little humpback stole out from the shadows immediately behind him, and leaned over Joel, rubbing his hands gleefully.

"I must catch his soul," said the little black man.

And with that he turned Joel's head round sharply, and held his hands to the dying man's mouth. Just then there fluttered up to Joel's lips a tiny yellow flame. There on Joel's lips the flame hung quivering. And now a deeper shadow fell upon his face.

Surely the tiny thing shuddered with horror as the humpback's black paws closed upon it! But, in any case, it now was safely prisoned. And the little black man laughed long and loudly.

"Not so bad a bargain after all!" chuckled he.

Ambrose Bierce---Satirist

By Democritus

Of One Who Wrote:

"When gold or power is their aim,
The smile of beauty or the wage of shame,
Men dwell in cities; to this place they fare
When they would conquer an abiding fame."

Announcement of an edition de luxe in ten volumes of the writings of Ambrose Bierce is issued from the publishing house of Neale & Company of New York and Washington. Ten volumes is not too much of Bierce, nor is a sumptuous edition of his varied literary activities beyond the worth of the work or the merit of the workman.

If I were to attempt to classify the results of Bierce's literary effort during more than thirty years, I think I should proceed upon a process of elimination rather than upon a method of segregation. It would be easier to say what he is not, than to tell what he is. His ability is many-sided and wholly intellectual. There is little of pathos in Bierce's work but there is a vasty sympathy underlying all that he wrote. He realized as do all men who think clearly, that pathos in literature is near akin to bathos, and that the tear of the crocodile is little different in its outward aspect or its physical element, from "drops that sacred pity hath engendered." It has not been the bent of Bierce's genius to conjure the gentler emotions of men nor to play upon them with all his thumbs. That which will live longest in Bierce's far-flung contribution to the literature of his age will be the portion which is firm set in the eternal verities; and there is much of this—for Bierce is nothing if he is not in the final analysis of his work an earnest, honest, truthful advocate of Justice; therein lies all his force in his chosen field of satire; and it is of his satire that I wish to speak briefly in this relation.

Bierce has been accused of dealing too constantly in mere personalities; that he has bludgeoned butterflies on the wheel of his wit; that he has wasted the force of heavy ordnance in the slaughter of inconsequential sparrows—whose value is but two for a farthing (Matt. x. 29) or five for two farthings (Luke xii. 6). He has himself sufficiently answered this criticism in his frequently iterated denial of "the remarkable doctrine that while condemning the sin the satirist should spare the sinner":

"Against abstractions evermore you charge;
You hack no helmet and you need no targe.
That wickedness is wrong and sin a vice
That wrong's not right and foulness never nice
Fearless affirm. All consequences dare:
Smite the offense and the offender spare."

Following this rule strictly, Bierce has invariably compelled the vicious to suffer the penalty of their vices. Thus it was that in his scorn of venal hypocrisy and smug self-sufficiency he singled out the Call and the Bulletin of this city as conspicuous targets for the arrows of his epigram and the shafts of his invective, the editors of those newspapers being the bull's-eyes in which the unerring missiles of his wit found permanent lodgment:

"O bad old man, must thy remaining years
Be passed in leading idiots by their ears—
Thine own (which Justice, if she ruled the roast,
Would fasten to the penitential post)
Still wagging sympathetically—hung
On the same rocking-bar that bears thy tongue?

* * * * * *

No, no—beneath thy multiplying load
Of years thou canst not tarry on the road
To dabble in the blood thy leaden feet
Have pressed from bosoms that have ceased to beat
Of reputations margining thy way,
Nor wander from the path new truth to slay."

And of those who "lie for the lust of lying" and to glut the ire of their envious prejudice, he wrote:

"In mental combat but a single end
Inspires the formidable to contend.
Not by the raw recruit's ambition fired,
By whom foul blows, though harmless, are admired;
Not by the coward's zeal, who, on his knee
Behind the bole of his protecting tree,
So curves his musket that the bark it fits,
And firing blows the weapon into bits;
But with the noble aim of one whose heart
Values his foeman for he loves his art,
The veteran debater moves afield,
Untaught to libel as untaught to yield.
Dear foeman mine, I've but this end in view—
That to prevent which most you wish to do.
What, then, are you most eager to be at?
To hate me? Nay, I'll help you sir in that.
This only passion does your soul inspire:
You wish to scorn me. Well, you shall admire.

* * * * * *

No falsehood you can tell, no evil do
Shall turn me from the truth to injure you.
So all your war is barren of effect;
I find my victory in your respect.
What profit have you if the world you set Against me? For the world will soon forget
It taught me this or that; but I'll retain
A vivid picture of your moral strain,
And cherish till my memory expire
The sweet, soft consciousness that you're a liar
Is it your triumph then to prove that you
Will do the thing that I would scorn to do?
God grant that I forever be exempt
From such advantage as my foe's contempt."

The political preacher, the demagogue of the pulpit, the Boanerges thundering damnation upon all opinion not in accord with their own concerning the cause and remedy of this "sorry scheme of things," were special objects of Bierce's scorn and contempt. In rebuke of those who had denounced the profane press as immediate spasm of a Satanic progenitor, he delivered this ultimatum of stinging invective:

"Sir, what were you without the press, What spreads
The fame of your existence once a week,
From the Pacific Mail Dock to the Heads,
Warning the people you're about to wreak
Upon the human ear your Sunday freak?
Whereat the most betake them to their bed
Though some prefer to slumber in the pews
And nod assent to your hypnotic views.

Unhappy man! can you not still your tongue
When (like a luckless brat afflict with worms,
By cruel fleas intolerably stung
Or with a pang in its small lap) it squirms?
Still must it vulgarize your feats of lung?
No preaching better were, the sun beneath
If you had nothing there behind your teeth."

What Bierce wrote in those days he might repeat with emphatic variation in these times that seem to be trying men's souls in the same city where once before the "counsel for the Man of Sin" stood and swayed

"That magic wand which, like a flame,
Leapt, wavered, quivered and became A wonder-worker—known among
The ignoble vulgar as a Tongue."

Still might he find "the Judge on the bench looking awfully stern," when "the District Attorney begins to attorn"; where "public sycophants in homage bend the populace to flatter ,and repeat the doubled echoes of its loud conceit"; cautiously and furtively creeping "to eminence through paths of shame

"Till fixed securely in the seats of pow'r,
The dupes they flattered they at last devour";—

confronting again the same breed of vox populying demagogues whose influence still gathering head "to east and west its tides encroaching spread" until

"There'll be, on all God's foot-stool, when they meet,
No clean spot for God to set his feet."

Here too, as of yore, will he find in his later visitation

> "Liars for witnesses, for lawyers brutes
> Who lose their tempers to retrieve their suits;
> Cowards for jurors; and for judge a clown
> Who ne'er took up the law, yet lays it down;
> Justice denied, authority abused,
> And the one honest person the accused—" forced to exclaim as he did then,

> "Thy courts, my country, all these awful years, > Move fools to laughter and the wise to tears."

Surely this Bierceian humor is all pervasive and as permanent in its applicability to men, manners and the methods of self-seeking panders to ochlocratic clamor in these modern conditions as was the mordant sarcasm of Juvenalian comment upon "the doings of men, their hopes, their fears, their runnings to and fro" in the days when Rome had become undisputed mistress of the world, and resting on her blood-stained conquests was content to grow inert and powerless. Yet only in its rough and rasping invective is the satire of Bierce a reflex of Juvenal; in its finer quality, its more subtle essence, it is vividly reminiscent of Horace whose odes proclaim him the consummate master of diction and fit to wear the laurel crown conferred by common consent upon the brow of one who refused to take it from the imperial hand of Augustus. If in Bierce we discover an abiding trace of the Pantagruelism which its creator defined as "a certain jollity of mind pickled in the scorn of fortune," we may also observe in a still more marked degree the influence of Swift and Pope mellowed and refined by studious contact with those scintillant geniuses of witcraft who did such wondrous things at the Mermaid.

San Francisco furnished much of the material upon which Bierce bestowed his "satire, keen and critical, not sorting with a nuptial ceremony, but very tragical mirth" for those who were compelled to endure it. Our Stricken City then as now was thick-infested with a pestiferous and persumptuous folk strutting with braggart effrontery in the presence of better men and wiser; pious pharisees of the pulpit dealing venomous vituperation round to make "a godly-thorough reformation" by compounding for sins they were inclined to and damning those they had no mind to; jack-poets "lolling on the Parnassian mount" "to wake the lyre and put the world to sleep"; politicians well content to "let Glory's sons manipulate the tiller of the State," if theirs might be "the humble, useful toil to work the tiller of the soil"; editors of newspapers, howling dervishes of the tripod, denouncing other editors in language "scathing," writ with pens called "trenchant"; bullying lawyers arguing law with one hand on their hip pockets; political puritans snuffling and snivelling in the market place, bemoaning the unchastity of their fellowmen and demanding that the meretricious drabs be incontinently immured in the Magdalen asylum, the while their own harems resound to the bickering of frowsy odalisques; lantern-jawed "moralists" whose "morals" repose in whited sepulchres; stone-throwing "reformers" blatantly proclaiming themselves without sin, heaving their brick-bats all unheedful of the danger of retaliatory assault upon their own citadels of glass—these and a score of others typical of the tribe of Ishmael, were merry game for Bierce's merry muse; and long before he went out from this environment the motley crew of those by whom he was offended were in hiding or scurrying to cover. But Bierce was ever true to the rule of his art which prescribes that the mazzard of vice shall be thwacked athwart the jowls of the vicious.

The Spectator

Perils That Environ a Social Cicerone

That eminent social arbiter, Mr. Ned Greenway, had a narrow escape the other night, his friends say, from an unpleasant experience with the familiars of the graft inquisition. To appreciate the episode in its entirety it should be understood that the ramifications of the graft feud extend through the entire fabric of local society, involving all the members of the "exclusive" as well as the "smart" set. As the masculine protagonists in this great drama are arrayed in bitter antagonism to each other so are the women of their households far from "speaking terms" with one another. Parties, receptions, routs and cotilions in which the prosecution ladies participate are not graced by the presence of the women folk whose kindred and friends are in the defendant class, and the feminine contingent of the prosecution is not on the visiting lists of those accused. Verona is a city divided against itself and the followers of the house of Montague Prosecutor will have naught in common with those who are loyal to the house of Capulet Calhoun—therefore even Romeo and Juliet do not dance in the same set and they have not yet reached the balcony phase of their revolt against the unhappy conditions imposed by their warring families. The social arbiter of elegant "affairs" and "events" bavarded in the court columns of the newspapers, is wholly disinterested in the matter of the invitations he issues to the exclusives and the smarts, and this impartial attitude has offended the Montague wing of the prosecution who have issued a peremptory order that none of the Capulets shall be bidden to his dancing club. The arbiter of course has disregarded the command and as a consequence his friends have warned him to beware, but whether merely to have some fun at his expense it is hard to say. At any rate, so the story goes, he was almost caught napping recently. One night when seeking relaxation from his arduous duties in his automobile on the beach a bunch of rubber-heeled individuals got on his trail, but a friendly insider warned the arbiter that it had been arranged to raid the beach resorts that night as soon as he should be safely within the precincts of any one of the casinos he might select as the scene of his mild little orgie. Alighting from his chariot he sent the vehicle empty to the door of a cafe-by-the-sea and watching afar in the night gloom, where the "ribbed-sea-sand" shimmered response to the caress of the starlight, he saw four "plainclothesmen" ghost-dance out the shadows and peer down at the number on the tailboard of the auto. When they had scented their prey they went into the joy house to nab it but it wasn't there. Consequently nothing was raided on the beach that night. And the smile on the face of the arbiter was as a moonbeam of wine of choicest vintage frapped to cool the palate of one who has thirsted in a weary land.

dorsed by the self-interested Call, and ably seconded by the erudite editor of the Red Dog Clarion, is not likely to avail much profit to the Call or much damage to the Examiner. Nothing in journalism "turns a corner" with more fox-like agility than a daily paper when the dogs are in full cry and the horn of the hunter is heard on the hill. The Call in this instance is certainly no match for the Examiner in the newspaper game. The news of the world in detail, and all the essential news of the parish may now be found featured in the Examiner, in striking contrast with the wasted columns of ill-digested opinion of "the graft situation" in this city quoted by the Call from the Yreka Bugle of Freedom and the Inyo Palladium of Liberty. Great events are gathering in Europe; the German emperor has been exercising his right of free speech contrary to the statutes made and provided for the curbing of unruly members of royal families; there's a hint of war in the Balkans; China seeks a "triple alliance"; India is on the verge of revolt against British tyranny; Roosevelt can shoot anything that walks on four hoofs or flies within range of his rifle in Africa; Japan insists upon being our dearest friend; the Servians and the Austrians are shooting each other on sight; Carnegie has declared in favor of revising and lowering the tariff; Taft will probably sit down on "Uncle Joe" Cannon with a dull, sickening thud—all this is in the Examiner, and much more of minor importance but intense with "human interest," demanding that it be read by every intelligent citizen who would reinforce his intelligence with knowledge of the world's history in the making. Little or none of this news is printed in the Call. There is no room for it. The "space schedule" of that newspaper is exhausted upon "stories" from the hospital, the morgue, the county jail and Judge Lawlor's courtroom, boycott resolutions, Walter McArthur's speeches, remarks upon the moral depravity of the town by the gifted authoress of "In the Bishop's Carriage," a moral novel depicting the amusing adventures of a street outcast who was arrested for shoplifting; more resolution by people who insult their own intelligence by insisting that assassin Haas was "inspired" by the "higher-ups" to shoot Special Prosecutor Heney and was subsequently assassinated in his turn by the agents of the "higher-ups" aforesaid, the spare columns being filled with additional "editorial opinion" of metropolitan affairs by the Yuba Dam Tidings and the Poverty Flat Courier. It is the difference between a newspaper and an organ. And no boycott can long prevail against a newspaper; neither can it long sustain an organ. The Examiner survived the McKinley hue and cry and it will probably survive the hysterical resolutions of the Ladies' League of Justice and the frantic efforts of the Call's circulation agents. The Examiner may be a bold, bad newspaper as it was when it was accused of assassinating President McKinley, but it is a newspaper now as it was then, and those who refuse to "take" it at their homes because it is "unfit to be read in a respectable family" that reads the Call in the morning and the "boughten Bulletin" at night, will buy it "on the way down town" to inform themselves concerning what is going on in the world outside of the local parish. As long as the Examiner continues to print what the people want to read it will be immune from the bubonic plague of the boycott; and as long as the Call continues to print less than the people want to read it will play third fiddle in the newspaper orchestra of San Francisco.

The Jumping Hopper of Carson

In the days before the fire the Palace Hotel was the rendezvous of old-time Nevada mining men who got into the habit of assembling there when Senator Sharon was alive and never got over it. Their ranks are thinning rapidly, but occasionally one meets a little bunch of them at the Fairmont where, with the garrulity of age, they revive recollections of the gay and romantic days of the Comstock. The other night, while listening to the reminiscences of two grizzled veterans at the Fairmont my patience was rewarded by one good story in which figured John Mackay and Maurice Hoeflich, the broker who died several years ago. According to the narrator Hoeflich, who was in Mackay's employ at Carson, had a habit of backing his opinion with money, a circumstance that was annoying to the millionaire. One day Hoeflich was playing with an enormous grasshopper. It could jump over twenty feet, he said. "I'll ped you fifty dollars, Mr. Mackay, dot you can't find a hopper to peat him." Mackay sent a trusted emissary down to Carson Valley to secure a contestant. The man spent nearly a week catching hoppers, and reported that the best gait any of them made was seventeen feet. He doubted if a bigger jumper could be found anywhere. The next day he arrived with about a dozen hoppers, and Mackay gave them quarters in his rooms. Each had a cigar box to himself, and every morning they were taken out and put through their paces. It was impossible, however, to get one to jump over eighteen feet. Mackay was in despair; but one morning a hopper sniffed at a bottle of ammonia on the table and immediately jumped thirty feet. Next day Mackay announced to Hoeflich that he was ready for the match. The expert came an hour before the time with his pet hopper. Not finding Mackay in, he noticed the bottle of ammonia. A light broke upon him. Grabbing the bottle he rushed to a drug store, threw away the ammonia, and ordered it to be filled with chloroform. Mackay soon arrived with a half dozen mining superintendents, whom he invited to see him have some fun with Hoeflich. They were hardly seated when Hoeflich came in with the hopper in a cigar box under his arm. "I vas a leetle late, Mr. Mackay, but I'm here mid der hopper and der coin." He laid down the money, which was covered promptly. Mackay got behind somebody and let his hopper sniff at the ammonia bottle, which held Hoeflich's chloroform. Time being called, the hoppers were placed side by side on the piazza, and at the word "Go" each one was touched on the back with a straw. Hoeflich's entry scored twenty-four feet. Mackay's gave a lazy lurch of some four inches, and, folding his legs, fell fast asleep.

Marines Are Now Policemen

At the naval stations hereabouts the only topic of discussion nowadays is the order issued by President Roosevelt last week withdrawing the Marine Corps from the ships of the navy. The duties of the corps in future will be to garrison navy yards and naval stations, both within and beyond the continental limits of the United States; to furnish the first line of the mobile defence of naval bases and naval stations beyond the continental limits of the United States; to man such naval defences and to aid in manning, if necessary, such other defences as may be erected for the protection of naval bases and naval stations; to garrison the Isthmian Canal zone, and to furnish such garrisons and expeditionary forces for duties beyond the seas as may be necessary in time of peace. The order becomes effective at once, and will be carried out as it suits the convenience of the navy to send the various detachments ashore. This is the most revolutionary change in the history of the navy with the exception of the amalgamation of the engineers with the line officers, and it will take the service a long while to get used to it. It was done against the protest of the highest marine officers and will probably have a blighting effect upon the future of the corps, which, aside from foreign service, will be reduced to policing navy yards. It may lead to proposals to amalgamate the marines with the army as in some foreign services.

A Revolutionary Order

President Roosevelt's order, which, by the way, has hardly been mentioned in any of our parochial daily journals, is sensational and revolutionary. The marines have been identified with our navy for 133 years. They have formed a part of the complement of every ship of any size since the first American man-of-war went to sea. History credits the Marine Corps with some of the most brilliant achievements of the American navy. In all the early battles of our navy the marines played a conspicuous and honorable part. In the civil war the landing of marines for shore attacks was one of their chief uses. They fought side by side with the sailors. The gallant conduct of the marines at Guantanamo won them the favor of Congress, with the result that the corps was increased from 78 officers and 1450 men to 328 officers and 9,521 men. To the American marines belongs the credit of having saved the legations at Pekin during the Boxer rebellion. And now they are to be dubbed the "navy yard police," and, in all probability, contrasted to their disadvantage with the army. Naturally, the versatility of the officers and the mobility of the corps will suffer.

More "Ancestors" Than Population

I think it was David Starr Jordan who said that by the laws of permutation or some other arithmetical hocus-pocus, it would be an easy trick to trace the lineage of anybody to William the Conqueror, or any other glorified bandit of the barbarous age. The Jordonian process of roping a suitable ancestor from the herd of ancient heroes runs something like this: Every son of posterity has two parents; these parents have or had four parents; these in turn had eight progenitors and these were the offspring of sixteen parents; the next calculation gives 32 and the next sixty-four, exhausting the fragments of only seven generations. Thence backward the computation proceeds until we have covered twenty-eight generations of thirty years or an accumulation of 840 years which would bring us well into the period of the Norman's illegitimate progeny. If our calculation has been accurate, each of us ought to have, according to Dr. Jordan, 189,459,456 ancestors, among whom, of course, William of Normandy would be included, for the very palpable reason that there were not at that time anywhere near 189,459,456 ancestors then living in Normandy, and it is doubtful if all Europe as it was then populated contained that number. Yet figures, it is said, do not or cannot lie. And I do not believe that Dr. Jordan would be an accessory before or after the fact as averred by these appraently impossible and inveracious figures.

Noble Normans for American Dollars

However, Miss M. E. Tillinghast has just ascertained after much research, that Mrs. Russell Sage's ancestors not only "came over with the Conqueror," but that a goodly bunch of them were all sorts of aristocrats as the aristocracy of that rabble horde of robber barons was graded and classified at that time. One in particular, Drogo de Monte Acuto, an ironclad warrior in the train of Robert, Earl of Moreton, after the Conquest, is identified as the real beginning of Mrs. Sage's family; there were others before Drogo, but Miss Tillinghast deemed them superfluous and perhaps not entirely respectable. Anyway she pauses at the cognizance of the progenitor of the Dukes of Sandwich and Manchester, of Lady Wortley Montagu and the Duke of Salisbury, and having safely delivered these genealogical goods with a footnote to the effect that Mrs. Sage's "ancestral home" was the famous castle of Battle Abbey, pockets her fee and writes the record of her opulent client in her Book of the American Descendants of the English Peerage. Miss Tillinghast will perform the same ancestral services for anybody who will pay her price, which is per schedule according to the magnitude of the ancestry desired—Mrs. Sage's family tree was a comparatively cheap one, for, by the expenditure of a little more money she might have had Old Bill the Norman himself for her grandparent in the 28th degree under the simple Jordanic plan of accumulation, aggregation and elimination.

Pampered Educators

Dr. Fred Burk, of the State Board of Education, has accused the text-book sellers of corrupting the official morals of his colleagues of the State Board by wining and dining them into a mood unduly favorable to the superior merits of the books printed by the firms represented by the purveyors of the bottles and birds. Dr. Burk has also mentioned duck shooting excursions at the expense of the book drummers as a means to a similar end; and finally he has charged that the hitherto innocuous pastime of tennis has been utilized by the same agencies as a lure preliminary to a long slide on the toboggan that leads easily to the Avernus of the publishing trade. It is an occult bribery in the form described by Dr. Burk; only the keen eye of a rank insider would be able to discern the dark iniquity of its purpose. Many crimes, it is true, have been plotted at the banquet board; hunting excursions of various purpose have been the vehicle of conspiracies that have found lasting record in the pages of history; and it was in the hall of the Jeu de Paume or royal tennis court of Versailles that the noble representatives of the Third Estate swore their famous oath to form a constitution for France; but this is the first intimation that they could be used as the fulcra upon which to rest the lever that pries open the coffer of the text-book buying public of California. Bridge whist or draw poker would have been a much readier method of "reaching" the educators. In this connection, however, the question obtrudes: Why buck against the shadow of a bribery when a more substantial profit might be achieved by settling the entire text-book question for a definite period of years? Why should the parents of California be taxed in dollars that many of them can ill afford to pay for new text-books ordered at the beginning of each term of the schools? Why is it never possible to pass the schoolbooks from child to child of the same family as it reaches the grade in which the book has been used? Herein is the iniquity of our text-book system; and if Dr. Burk will concentrate his efforts on a stationary list of text-books for our schools, he will earn the lasting gratitude of every parent in the State. It is even possible that these parents may erect a monument in his honorable memory with some of the money they will save after Dr. Burk has effected this long-desired reform.

Foo Duck Doesn't Have To Go

The most recent decision concerning the Chinese exclusion act was rendered the other day in the United States District Court for the State of Montana, in the case of Foo Duck, who appealed from an order of deportation. The question presented for consideration was this: Where a minor comes to the United States from China for the purpose of joining his father, who is a merchant lawfully domiciled in the United States, and thereafter during his minority such minor labors and studies in the United States, is he entitled to remain in the United States after attaining his majority or is he liable to deportation? "In my opinion," said the Judge of the court, "such a person is lawfully entitled to remain within the United States. The boy while a minor acquired a right of domicile by virtue of his father having such a right; that is, the father's domicile being in this country, as the parent he has the right to have his minor child enter. This right was independent of any application for a certificate or compliance with other provisions of the law. (U. S. vs. Mrs. Gue Linn, 176 U. S. 459.) The minor really had no occupation when he entered, hence was not within the purview of Section 6, relating to those who must obtain certificates. The reasoning which led to the construction of the statute whereby it was decided that the wife of one who is himself entitled to enter may enter without any certificate is applicable also to the case of a minor child of one so entitled to enter. Both are natural and lawful dependents upon the one who may lawfully have established his domicile in the United States."

Obituaries That Were Death Warrants

When the dispatches first announced the death of the Empress of China I was inclined to doubt the report. This versatile and wholly untrustworthy old lady has been dead before and at the point of death a score of times; and in every instance the presumption that she had been gathered or was swiftly gathering to the tombs of her ancestors has been fatal to those whose political or personal aspirations made it difficult or impossible to dissemble their joy. On one occasion the Dowager raised herself from the dead and off went the heads of a dozen Chinese Buckinghams at one fell swoop of the palace executioner's vorpal blade. She has frequently laid down to die and given out that she had been given up by all the astrologers and soothsayers of the Forbidden City, only to rise again like a tiger cat refreshed to glut her venegance in the blood of hardy conspirators whom she had long suspected but who had managed to elude her until they imagined they were safe in expressing their candid opinion of her utter unworth. I hope her immortal part will pardon me for doubting her when she is dead beyond recall. From him who often doth deceive the truth itself is not believed.

Fatal Politics

The coincidence of the deaths of the Dowager and the Emperor was ground for the suspicion of a palace intrigue of unusual virulence. It was thought that if the Dowager was poisoned first she immediately commissioned her familiar, the pseudo eunuch Li, to put a quietus upon her imperial nephew, to the end that he should not thwart her life-long policy of reaction by postmortem disobedience of her express command that there should be no drastic reform in China in any direction. It may be, however, that the complication worked the other way and that Huang Hsu got the dope first but managed to put the cup to the lip of his amiable aunt before she was aware that her own plot had worked its deadly climax. It is certain that if either felt the intestinal twinge that warned of an incurable indigestion the other knew where to plant the counter poison. There is no antidote for the mandragora that is brewed in the imperial laboratory of toxicology within the vermilion walls of the Yellow City.

We may believe any of the tales that will whisper from the dark recesses of the ghost-haunted, blood-drenched court of the usurping Manchus.

Genesis of the Dowager

A strange career is that of the old woman who died shrieking in Peking the other day. The daughter of a small military mandarin in Yunnan of Southwestern China she passed her girlhood in almost abject poverty, so poor that when her father's meager pension from the government was delayed a few days the rice merchant with whom the family dealt refused to give them any more rice on credit. High spirited in her youth and her destitution as she was in her mature womanhood and the plenitude of imperial power, she cursed the reluctant rice merchant to his face, with the hope that all his children might be girls—the most insulting anathema in the Chinese Book of a Thousand Unhappy Fates. Another rice merchant standing by, sympathizing or seeking to forestall a probable appeal to himself, offered the rice that the other had refused. That rice merchant died a viceroy. Yet the missionaries say the Empress Dowager knew not what gratitude was. The father died and the mother, the daughter and a numerous family took junk down the Great River to seek a fortune predicted to Tsi An by a prophetic old hag of the village. At Han-yang they were starving upon a scant bowl of rice for the entire family and unknowing where the next bowl would come from. One of the protecting gods, the one that inspired the village sibyl, no doubt, induced the Governor of the province to send to the widow of the mandarin and her hungry brood not only bowls of rice (the bowls of Nanking porcelain) but also huge platters of roast pork, hampers of boiled pigeons' eggs, crates of broiled ducks, caddies of flower pekoe, a tea quoted even in that region at 125 taels a picul, besides all the luxuries that complement a banquet composed of these viands. The truth of history compels the statement that the Governor did not intend to send this sumptuous fare to the widow of a small mandarin; his blundering coolies mistook the junk of the widow for that of a red-button mandarin who was passing that way and whom the Governor wished to specially honor. But when he received the grateful widow's letter of thanks the next day it was too late to recall the gift and the official, following a well-known Confucian precept, accepted the credit of his charity without protest. That Governor died many years after full of honors and rich with a viceroy's spoil of two provinces.

Full of Years and Iniquity

Thenceforward the destiny of the future Empress of China was as the old woman of the village had predicted. Whether she sold curd cakes and perserved ginger in the streets of Peking, or danced for hire in the sing-song houses of the Tartar City is of little moment; that she was the favorite concubine of a nobleman of high degree is well authenticated; and when the annual edict issued from the imperial harem for a candidate to be the mother of a son of heaven, this fortuneless daughter of a small military mandarin was entered in the lists and chosen by the imperial commissioners. She went to the Western Palace and there gave birth to a man child who was named to be the Emperor of the Middle Kingdom. From that event the power of this waif of the sunset province was illimitable and irresistible; as the legitimate wives of the imperial household were relegated to the common seraglio of the Eastern palace. Some died suddenly and others lingered and wasted. Then the emperor died; but the counter-stroke fell on the son of the imperial favorite. If it was all premeditated it was a useless thrust for by this time Tsi An could dictate the succession, which she did. Then at the opportune time she deposed the young emperor and reigned absolute in his place—supreme arbiter upon the life, death and fortune of a third of all the people who inhabit the earth! Now she is dead in her seventy-fourth year—a hale and hearty old age—preserved it is said to that period in the outward bloom of a woman of forty, by a diet of human milk from nursing women, changed monthly. A wonderful old woman! A terrible old woman! A veritable dragon coiled on an age-battered throne—a Manchu of the Manchus, and a wise old serpent—wise and ferocious; inscrutably wise and treacherously ferocious! Millions rejoice that her tablet hangs in the hall of her ancestors.

A Ladylike Conspiracy

I hope I may be permitted to say a few words in answer to an honest young lady proponent of the Graft Prosecution who has been advising a conspiracy of women to ruin the business of any merchant who will not pledge himself to support the prosecution. I would like to utter my thoughts on the subject. Ordinarily, I am aware, it would be ungallant and ungentlemanly to offer the slightest objection to the opinion or the wishes of a lady; but in this instance I think the lady has abrogated her right to be treated differently from a mere man who may arise to advocate violation of the Cartwright law by inciting a boycott upon such business men of this city as happened to hold opinions concerning public affairs contrary to the opinions of the person organizing the conspiracy in restraint of trade. I hope that she will not plead her petticoats in bar of my protest against what she is reported to have said at a public meeting of women assembled to "assist the cause of justice" by "withdrawing their patronage" from everybody who attempted to exercise the

A Moral Groceryman

"There are several grocerymen in my neighborhood," this lady is reported to have said. "I deal with the man whose morals are clean, although his stock is not so plentiful and so varied as the other dealers. But I am rewarded in knowing that his morals are right." I hope this lady justicer will eventually reveal the name and address of this moral purveyor of provisions. Perhaps some of the rest of us would like to deal with him. Most of us are now forced to buy our groceries from immoral grocerymen, villainous wretches who would not hesitate to cut throats or scuttle ships if the laws that some of the reformers threaten to have repealed by the next legislature, did not forbid such babarous practices. We are tired of eating immoral groceries and we yearn to feed upon ham, for example, that is butchered from the limbs of strictly moral hogs, and upon eggs that were laid in the odor of sanctity; we long to traffic for our daily bread, our weekly butter and our monthly cheese, with some grocery saint-elect as yet uncanonized because he is still untombed. It sounds absurd to mix morality with our groceries like a coffee blend of Costa Rica and Java, but the inception of the absurdity is not mine—the lady opened the debate; as her moral groceryman would open a can of tomatoes or a box of sardines. Furthermore, it must be admitted that if we are justified in demanding absolute purity of the food we buy in the grocery stores we are logically justified in demanding that the purity of the groceryman himself shall be immaculate as the food he sells. It should not be necessary to thrust morality on the dealer by virtue of the pure food laws; on the contrary the morality of the dealer should be so contagious that it will infect the food in his shop. And since a "great wave of morality" is now "sweeping" over the town, let us all unite in a prayer that it may roll on until every immoral groceryman in the city is permanently and effectually submerged.

An Immoral Newspaper

I don't suppose that the lady whose illegal conspiracy on behalf of the cause of morality has excited my ribald laughter, will deny that consistency is a phase of morality. I don't suppose the lady would knowingly advise her sister moralists to "patronize" only moral grocerymen and in the same breath counsel them to put their money into the purse of immoral newspapermen. Yet that is precisely what she is doing in commending the "Boughten Bulletin" to her co-conspirators in the holy cause of morality. Wherefore I assume, in all charity, that she is either a stranger in San Francisco, or that she has not read Congressman Kahn's speech delivered in the recent campaign, reviewing and analyzing the immoral status of the newspaper which she so earnestly commends to the moral consideration of her sister conspirators.

Irene—Say, my little sister Sadie's got a new job passing around the hat.

Accused Us of the Bubonic Plague

Norman Hapgood and Charles Dana Gibson have been in town. Norman Hapgood is one of Peter Collier's weekly editors and Charles Dana Gibson is chiefly famous for a creation in art called "the Gibson girl," a kind of girl that never yet on sea or land confirmed incarnate the ideal of her maker. Norman Hapgood is the editorial writer who recently libeled this city by offering it as a horrible example of the bubonic plague and a contagious warning for other cities, especially New York, where the plague has probably always existed unknown to the learned doctors because those wise medical guys have never received orders from the superior medical guys of Washington to chase the rat to catch the flea that bites the man that dies of this distemper. When asked about this matter Mr. Hapgood promptly dodged by saying that he had commended San Francisco for its fight against the plague while condemning the inaction of "the cities and counties about the bay." He even expressed surprise that San Francisco had been angry over the article while the cities "really attacked" had passed it in silence. Evidently Editor Hapgood acts as he writes, and in neither relation is he the artful dodger that a shifty editor should be. For when Hapgood isn't dodging he is retracting; and when he isn't retracting he is plucking the barbs from wounds inflicted by those whom he has offended and hanging them up as ornaments in his editorial sanctum duly labeled with his editorial comment facetiously expressed. Still, notwithstanding all the mean things that Hapgood has said about us and all the damage he has done to the business interests of the town in addition to that which we are doing ourselves, we will not advise a boycott of the weekly for which he writes. We prefer to reserve that tyranny for our own newspapers.

California Sugar Magnates in Opposition

Two Californians are taking an active part in the tariff discussion that is now engaging the attention of the Ways and Means Committee at Washington. And singularly enough they are in opposition to each other. One is Henry T. Oxnard, who represents the beet sugar interests, and the other is Claus Spreckels who wants the tariff taken off sugar. The fight for free trade in sugar is led by the Administration forces in the interest of the Philippine planters. The subject is of course of considerable interest to California for here much money is invested in the raising of sugar beets. Addressing the Committee Mr. Oxnard pointed out as evidence of the need of being let alone the small increase in the number of sugar refineries since 1897, which he attributed to agitation and the failure to get encouraging legislation that they had reason to expect from party promises. In the opinion of Mr. Oxnard the tariff on sugar should be increased. The menace of Philippine and Cuban sugar should also be checked. In the beet sugar business there was $60,000,000 invested and the return did not exceed six per cent. If the beet sugar men could not make money under existing conditions he did not see how the other sugar men could do it.

What Spreckels Said

Claus Spreckels as president of the Federal Sugar Refining Company submitted to the committee a prepared statement containing the following: "Beet sugar factories located in proper localities such as Colorado, Utah, Idaho and Oregon should, and I am informed can, produce granulated sugar at two and one half cents a pound. Of course if it be the purpose of this government to impose a tariff which will enable the production in unsuitable localities at the expense of the American public then an import duty is necessary and will always have to be maintained." Under fire of Mr. Fordney of Michigan of the Ways and Means Committee Mr. Spreckels agreed that free trade would drive the sugar factories out of Michigan and end sugar beet growing there. Michigan, he contended, was not the proper place to raise sugar beets or to turn them into sugar, and the protection of the industry there should not be continued. Mr. Spreckels started out by saying that his concern was independent, having no affiliation in any way with the sugar trust. Free trade on raw and refined sugars would benefit the whole country, he told the committee. The sugar trust, he declared, was the special beneficiary of the tariff. "I take no stock," added Mr. Spreckels, "in the old and threadbare theory that a duty on sugar must be maintained in order to provide adequate revenues for the government. I am satisfied that this committee can find other commodities on which to place duties for necessary revenue. The present tariff on sugar should certainly be reduced and gradually wiped out, and the quicker it is wiped out the better."

One More Wing

Now that the third wing of the St. Francis is "running full," as the hotel men say, the directors have definitely determined upon the fourth, or tower, wing on the corner. All the new part of the St. Francis is now open, except the Tapestry Room, and this will be finished in marble within a very short time, although in view of the two years required to weave the design of Arthur Matthews into fabrics, the tapestries may not be ready for many months—perhaps a year. The Club Room opened about a week ago and set a new standard for rooms of its type. The color scheme is said to be one of the finest ever conceived, the ceiling being rendered in grays of warm colors, a soft and pleasant transition from the fine wood panelling of the walls, upon which the huge Italian fireplace throws light from big burning logs. Arthur Putnam's modelling for the bar is an unusually good treatment of a simple decorative motive, and evidences the desire of the St. Francis to use the resources of native art rather than stock designs from the Continent. The gymnasium, on the twelfth floor of the new wing, has received general commendation; no less an authority than James Corbett declaring it to be the "real McCoy."

A Snap for Artists

That the esthetic element is a profitable one in business is recognized by the Hotel St. Francis management, which, after securing the tapestry designs of Matthews, the modelling of Putnam and the canvas of Charles Rollo Peters, has decided to set apart a room for exhibitions of the best California art. No charge will be made to the artists, whose only expense will be the trouble of handling the exhibitions; and it is thought that this will be an exceptional opportunity for our representative western painters and sculptors, not only to familiarize the travelers of the world with the fact that this is an art center, but also to dispose of their work to those who appreciate its value.

The Loewenberg Book Discussed

The Players Club of Alameda has been discussing Mrs. I. Loewenberg's notable book, "The Irresistible Current," which has excited interest in most of the women's clubs on both sides of the bay. Several of the literary women of Alameda analyzed the work and commended the sentiments expressed therein. Mrs. Loewenberg was the guest of honor and enjoyed the discussion, at the close of which she addressed the members of the club. With sincerity and frankness she defined her position, saying that she appealed neither to the Jew nor to the Christian, but had aimed at the truth and was trying to break down the barrier of prejudice that exists between the two faiths and that her desire was for a universal religion, one that would embrace the four essential points: Right thinking, humanity, immortality and God. Religion is a moral force and vitally important, a necessity for mankind. It is more the result of environment than of personal feeling. Charity should be given for mankind and not for any special church or order.

THE WEEK'S FINANCIAL OUTLOOK

By R. E. Mulcahy

As predicted in last week's letter a moderate reaction in Wall Street securities has taken place. The upward movement has gone farther than is general in a bull market without a shaking out. Now that it has come and gone the market is in a healthier position; weak holders have liquidated and their holdings have passed into stronger hands. There has been no news of particular moment during the past week that would affect market values. The examination of Mr. Rockefeller had no particular significance. Some rumors gained currency to the effect that Mr. Harriman was against any further advance in securities at the present time. It is seldom one dislikes to have their holdings appreciate. It was the best kind of a tip to buy on, as such information generally makes its appearance when the big market operators want to buy without attracting attention. It was quite evident that some one with a basket was catching all the Southern Pacific and Union Pacific securities that were thrown over by those who became scared. There has been a great deal of activity in the Hawley securities. There has been strong buying in all of the Colorado Southern issues, also Minneapolis and St. Louis and Iowa Central stocks. Hawley is one of the leading market factors although little is heard of him. Much interest has been manifested in the Standard Oil group, especially M. K. & T. This property has shown wonderful physical improvement within the past two years. Its business has made a very remarkable growth. It is claimed that the next annual report of this property will make a wonderful showing. There has been good buying of all the M. K. & T. stocks and bonds for some time past. The Gould properties are showing some life. The near at hand completion of the Western Pacific has stimulated interest in all the Gould securities. The steel issues were somewhat depressed on account of tariff revision talk; the steel company's officials say they are not worried in this respect from the fact that any revision of the tariff would affect the smaller properties virtually driving the little fellows out of business, thereby giving the larger concerns a monopoly. It is an even guess that whatever legislation takes place all conditions will have been taken well into consideration beforehand. The late depression has not been blotted from our minds long enough to disregard caution. Fair play will be more in evidence in the making of laws than ever before. The public have been educated sufficiently to understand all public issues and will not stand for the personal whims of politicians. We are starting on the right road; there should be no reason why our start should not continue to the end on a sound basis unless some crazy idea should be sprung. There never has been a period in the history of this country when so much prosperity was knocking at our door as at the present time. It is here with us in spite of conditions as many view them. I believe money will be plentiful for the next three years, and that three per cent investments will receive unusual consideration. Farmers are seeking employment for their surplus funds, which is the keynote to the whole situation.

Where the Rules are Enforced

Fancy a member of the Francisca Club entertaining gentlemen at luncheon behind the portals of that club, sacred as it is to the female of the species. The idea you will say is preposterous. Such a thing you will vehemently affirm never occurred. No indeed! The rules of the club forbid. But the rules notwithstanding one of the most distinguished members of the club ventured not long ago to make the club the scene of a little luncheon for men. And the ladies of the Board of Directors would not permit an infraction of the rules—no not even for Mrs. Eleanor Martin, who happened to be the lady that proposed giving the luncheon. As though any harm might be done in making an exception of the case of that amiable and beloved dowager! Awfully stingy with their old club—those Franciscans.

Fair Debutante, Beware!

There's trouble ahead for one of the sweetest of the debutantes, a vivacious little blonde who is somewhat indifferent to the amenities. She breaks her dancing engagements, I am told, and the young men are getting very sore. The specific charge against her is that at more than one dance where she met dancing partners who seemed to her particularly agreeable she forgot all about her other engagements. Now this is a pretty serious offense, for the victims sometimes enter into combination and resolved to make a wall flower of the offender. There has been some talk of inflicting this cruel and inhuman punishment on the fair debutante in question, though she is really sweet enough to be forgiven.

The Passion for Culture

The passion for culture in San Francisco society is gradually overcoming the propensity to vulgar frivolity. In more than one clique are to be observed aspirations toward the world of manners, wit and taste, and several representatives of the fashionable herd have developed a fine enthusiasm for the etheral atmosphere of culture. In some quarters Bohemianism is giving itself a great deal of swagger about its superiority to the vulgar conventions of society, and on all sides are women who have gone in for the intellectual and who are intoxicating themselves with the breath of the gods. The Spinners and Sequoia Clubs are doing their best to diffuse the light, such as it is, and the dark corners of Philistinia are being illuminated. Mrs. William Mayo Newhall is taking so serious an interest in the intellectual that she has started a class in literature and has engaged Professor Wilson, formerly of Miss Hamlin's school, to deliver a lecture once a week. At the first meeting of the class at this lady's home ninety disciples availed themselves of the opportunity for edification. Mrs. Ramon Wilson, who has absorbed a vast volume of knowledge on the subject of the drama, has been emitting copious draughts of it for the refreshment of her friends. She recently talked at the Spinners on "The Religious in Dramatic Art," a pregnant theme as all educated persons know. The lecture was illustrated with dramatic action by Miss Alice Colman. On another occasion lately Mrs. Wilson spoke on "The Revival of Art in India."

The Most Beautiful Woman

Praise from Sir Hubert is praise indeed, and a compliment from Charles Dana Gibson is worthy of preservation in family tradition. It is not surprising then that when the creator of the Gibson girl came to town the other day and beguiled the time in the lounging rooms of the Fairmont that he was more or less beset by pretty women, conscious of their own charms. Wherever the artist rendered himself accessible that could be seen a parade of femininity in its best bib and tucker, but the artist rendered himself accessible there could be seen a beautiful appeared to be off duty. But as a matter of fact he was on the qui vive and he did see one face that fascinated him, and it was the face of a young woman who was as unconscious of his presence as he appeared to be of the presence of nearly everybody. The face was that of Miss Anna Peters of Stockton. "Here," said Mr.

Gibson, filled with enthusiasm, "is a perfect type of a beautiful woman." At his request he was introduced to the beautiful Stockton girl. Hats off to the Slough City of the San Joaquin Valley.

The Beauties of Stockton

Miss Anna Peters, bythe way, does not walk off with all the laurels of the family. Her sister Genevieve, now Mrs. Syx, was once besieged by artists and photographers. The curve of her chin and throat was pronounced perfect and camera artists rushed out to her house to take her sitting at the piano and in all sorts of domestic poses. Stockton, by the way, takes high rank as a beauty cradle. Of Stockton were Mamie Wilhoit, now Mrs. Sid. Hodgkins, and Mrs. Francis Hodgkins (Mae Budd), who made her debut at sixteen at her uncle Jim's inaugural ball, and Ollie Neil, who was Mrs. Jim Budd's niece, Elsie Sperry (Mrs. Arno Dosch), Lily Bours, who married Dr. Wallace, and scores of beauties before the advent of these prizes. Ethel and Beth Sperry, now Mrs. Will Crocker and Princess Poniatowski, are remembered among the beauties, and there were the Kelsey and Trahern bevy of beauties, and Fannie Marks, who married Mr. Steinhart, and there are still dozens of them left—the three Mastos, and Florence Guernsey, Haidee Trahern and Leslie Hammond, besides others who are not "in society." If artist Gibson wants types of beauty Stockton is full of 'em.

Stockton's Great Climber

But Stockton's pride is not in her beauties only. She can claim as her own the first woman that ever climbed Mount Thibet—Harriet Chalmers Adams, who is now giving lectures through the East on the subject of her trip through the wilds of South America. Before her marriage with a popular clubman she was one of the belles of Stockton and a leader in her set. She is an accomplished musician and a delightful hostess. Though a woman somewhat frail of physique, she accompanied her husband into the wilds of South America, whither he was sent by an electric company. Now she commands big prices for her lectures and writes under an assumed name for leading magazines.

The Invitation Miscarried

A certain prominent young artist, whose paintings have been on exhibition of late, tells a good joke on himself. On the eve of a recent large wedding to which neither he nor his wife had received an invitation he met the sister of the bride-to-be with a number of mutual friends and the conversation turned on the impending event. Turning to the artist very sweetly the young lady said she hoped she would have the pleasure of seeing both his wife and himself the next morning. "We did not know exactly where to address your invitations, so we sent them to the Fairmont. Everybody seems to stop there when they come to town, so we were sure they would reach you." When recounted at the breakfast table the sharer of his joys and sorrows decided she'd go. Forthwith the artist went to the Fairmont to get the cards. "No," the clerk assured him, "there was no mail, nothing whatsoever." But the artist was positive and a thorough investigation not only of the M's but also of the Cs followed, and with no result. He returned empty-handed and at the festive board both his wife and he were conspicuous by their absence. The story has gone the rounds of the clubs and provided a good laugh. The artist, having a sense of humor, appreciates the joke.

The Brand of the Elect

The Colonial Dance invitations are out and the minds of the recipients are set at rest. Now society at large knows exactly who's who. Those who have not received cards in the opinion of those that have, are no longer of the social elect. The patronesses for the most part belong to the exclusive Burlingame coterie of intimates. In the daily social columns first one and then another of these ladies has been credited with having originated the idea of this new club. All of which makes one wonder what has been going on in the inner circle; what during these last weeks has been "the little rift within the lute." For to Mrs. Charles O. Alexander, who is said to have organized this new series of dances, little of the credit and much of the blame is given. In reality matters from the first were practically carried over her head. A number of her personal friends have been excluded from the list, which is a long one, and many of the unsuspecting who do not run around to every pink tea have been roused by an invitation from their social lethargy. It is practically a shaking up and a reorganization of the entire social system. Every name submitted was voted on and only those appearing on the greatest number of lists were marked eligible. Now that the fiat has gone forth the question on every side is, "Of course you are going to the Colonials?" It would never do to say "No," for at once you would be branded as socially inadequate. From the gossip of the hour it is evident that there is to be a lot of secret weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. But the supremacy of the Burlingame plutocray will be vindicated. The two balls to be given under the auspices of the new organization will of course be brilliant affairs. The second of these on February 23d is to be in regular Colonial costume, with fancy dress and powdered coiffures. It certainly will be a pretty sight to those of the elect who have been asked to participate.

Debuts Deferred

The debutante band, which originally was to have numbered thirty-three, has already dwindled down to twenty-eight. The girls who have dropped out will be sincerely missed as they were very popular. So far as Marian Miller and Vera de Sabla are concerned society can look forward to the pleasure of meeting them next winter when their postponed formal bow will be made. The Eugene de Sablas decided to winter at the St. Regis so Vera will spend the next few months in New York, much to the regret of her many friends here. She is a very pretty girl with a sweet vivacity of manner which is very attractive. Her sister, Mrs. Clement Tobin, will occupy the de Sabla home on Octavia street during their absence. Marion Miller is a very striking looking girl. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. O. G. Miller and like Vera de Sabla will spend the coming months on an Eastern trip. Lucile Wilkins, who was shortly to have been formally presented, forestalled matters somewhat by announcing her engagement to Tulliver Milton, so in place of a coming-out tea cards to her wedding are expected. Anna Weller and Eliza McMullan were to have made their debut at a large tea given in their honor by their grandmother, Mrs. John McMullin. The date was changed, however, and they will not make their formal bow for another week or so. The two Boerikes, Ruth and Dorothy, the attractive daughters of Dr. and Mrs. William Boerike, are also yet to be formally introduced. They already have attended all of the season's functions and bid fair to be among the most popular of the debutantes. Elena Brewer was to have been presented at a tea given by her sister, Miss Isabelle, but as the family will live in Mill Valley for another month the date of her formal coming out is indefinite. She has, however, received at most of the debutante teas so far, and is very much in demand at all social functions as she is a remarkably sweet and clever girl. Her sisters, Isabelle and Marie, made their debuts under the chaperonage of Mrs. Charles Alexander, whose daughter is winning laurels of her own this winter.

Our Debutantes

Harriett Alexander is considered by many the prettiest of the debutantes. She certainly is a very fascinating girl with a rare charm of manner unusual in a girl of eighteen. She made her formal bow at the first large tea of the season, that given by her aunt, Mrs. Mountford Wilson to Elizabeth Woods and herself. Elizabeth Woods is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert J. Woods and a niece of Charles Rollo Peters, the well known artist. She is a bright, clever girl and is very well liked. Gladys Brigham, a cousin of Harriett Alexander, is going to a few affairs this winter, although she will make no formal debut. Enid Gregg, the daughter of the Wellington Greggs, is also on the debutante list, as she has joined all the dances. But she will not be formally presented. She is of a very striking type and is more attractive than most of the debutantes. Enid is also a very accomplihsed maiden, being one of the most brilliant pianists among the younger girls. Dorothy Chapman and Avis Sherwood, who are first cousins, made their initial bow at a large ball given by their grandmother, Mrs. Robert Sherwood. Dorothy Chapman is the only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred B. Chapman. Innes Keeney and Dorothy have been voted the most vivacious of the buds. Innes is the younger daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles M. Keeney and a sister of Mrs. Tomlinson of New York. Innes so far has held the front rank with Harriett Alexander in popularity. She is very lively and full of fun. Added to that she is an unusually pretty girl, so she is bound to enjoy her first season to the full. Helen Jones made her debut at the large tea given by her mother, Mrs. Clinton Jones, two weeks ago. Helen is a remarkably pretty blonde, with very winning manners. She also is noted for her quick play of wit and her naive remarks and like her brothers Paul and Frank, will be a great social favorite. Suzanne Kirkpatrick, I consider, the daintiest of the debutantes. She is very pretty and has a decided charm of manner as has also her cousins, Clara Allen, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Allen. Both girls made their formal social entrance at a large tea given them by Clara's parents. Suzanne is the daughter of Colonel and Mrs. Kirkpatrick and is living at the Fairmont. She has entertained at a number of delightful teas and dinners, as has also Jeanne Gallois, who has recently returned from Europe. Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Gallois will winter at the Fairmont and it is there that Jeanne will be formally presented. She is a very original girl and a very pretty one of the brunette type. She has been alluded to already as being "the cutest of the debutantes."

Married in Her Mother's Wedding Gown

The marriage of Miss May Foulkes, daughter of the late Dr. John Franklin Foulkes, and Rev. William Thomas Renison took place on Wednesday afternoon, November 18th, at 4 o'clock at the residence of the bride's mother, Mrs. Margaret Foulkes on Spruce street. Owing to the illness of the bride's mother the marriage was without pomp or glittering circumstance. None but relatives and a few intimate friends witnessed the ceremony, which was performed by Rev. Robert Renison, the father of the groom. The bride belongs to an old and aristocratic Southern family. Her father, the late Dr. John Franklin Foulkes, was a prominent physician of Fayetteville, N. C., who came to California many years ago and settled in Oakland, where the family were prominent in business and social circles. The bride, a strikingly beautiful girl, never looked more lovely than she did at her marriage, gowned as she was in quaint style, the dress she wore being the one in which her mother was married. Much sentiment marked the wedding, the day of the ceremony being the anniversary of the marriage of the bride's mother and also of her grandmother. The groom, Rev. William T. Renison, is a graduate of Trinity College, Canada, and comes from a family of clergymen. His father, Rev. Robert Renison, is rector of an Episcopal church in Los Angeles, and one of his brothers, Rev. Robert Renison, Jr., is archdeacon of the Hudson Bay district, New York. Another brother, Rev. George Renison, is a missionary. The young couple will live in Stockton,

Another Debutante Dance

Florence Hopkins is to make her intial bow on December 4th at a ball similar to the one at which Katherine Donohoe was introduced. She is considered the beauty of her family and she has a most gracious manner. Margaret Calhoun, Martha's younger sister, is the debutante daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Patrick Calhoun and like her sister she is a very great favorite. The du Bois sisters, Hannah and Emily, are among the most frequent entertainers among the buds. They and Elizabeth Simpson, another bud, are wintering at the Hillcrest. Elizabeth Simpson is a vivacious little army maiden, the daughter of Colonel Simpson. She has been the motif for much delightful formal entertaining and has been the honored guest at two or three large bridge parties. Marian Marvyn and Doris Wilshire made their debut at the tea given by Mrs. W. B. Wilshire. Marian Marvyn is a dainty little blonde, not quite so beautiful as her sister Emily, whose marriage to Ray Somers was celebrated two years ago. Doris Wilshire is Mrs. Jack Polhemus's younger sister and bids fair, judging from her first Greenway, to be every bit as popular as her sister was before her marriage. Maud Wilson and Ethel McAllister were both presented at two of the season's largest teas, and Alice Oge, a sister of Mrs. Truxton Beale, will make her first appearance at a reception to be given this coming week at her home in San Rafael. Maud Wilson is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edgar M. Wilson and is a cousin of Lucile Wilkins. Ethel McAllister is the only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. M. Hall McAllister and has quite recently returned from a tour of Europe. The two Newhall sisters, Virginia and Frances, are fonder as a whole of out-door sports than of high teas, but they have already proved themselves well able to take their place in the debutante band, and as they play very cleverly and sing sweetly they are very much in demand. They are the daughters of the Edwin Newhalls and while not as pretty as their cousins, Elizabeth, Margaret and Marian, they promise to be every bit as well liked. It is to be regretted that Sarah Coffin will not be able to make her debut this year, but, they say, the fair maiden herself does not mind. If the debutantes keep up the good work as well as they have begun it is expected there will be many wedding bells ringing before the year is over. There are already one or two whispered engagements, but as the responsible parties continue laughingly to deny them, it is no use giving them publicity just yet.

Miss Pratt's Introduction

Miss Fernanda Pratt, who was introduced at a large tea given by her mother, Mrs. Simpson, the other day, is a strikingly handsome girl, a brunette with rich coloring. She has a great deal of literary talent, and when she was in Boston pursuing her musical studies she wrote letters home that are said to have been far more interesting than the matter that gets into print as "correspondence." She is a piano pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt, and was one of the organizers of the Mansfeldt Club of clever amateurs. She also sings well. She is a favorite with a large circle of friends, and her debut tea was a great crush. Particularly prominent among the callers were the ladies who form the cultured Channing Auxiliary, of which her mother is president.

A Californian's Success

A California girl is sharing in the honors Mrs. Fiske is winning in her new play, "Salvation Nell." I refer to Miss Merle Maddern. She is a cousin of Mrs. Fiske and a daughter of Mrs. Will Maddern. She is well known here, as she has given dramatic readings in clubs and drawing rooms on both sides of the bay. In "Salvation Nell" she plays the part of a drunken woman of the street, and her friends say that to all her innate refinement and beauty she must add great artistry to realize such a role.

The Latest from Paris

Although Enid Gregg has never been formally introduced to society she is going to all the bigger functions this winter, "just oozing out by degrees," as one very vivacious debutante expressed it. The Wellington Greggs have just returned from an eight-months' tour of Europe, and Miss Enid has come back with all the very latest in the wardrobe line. Her dresses and wraps are particularly beautiful, but her hats, they say, are "ultra." One that she wore to a luncheon this week is so large and drooping that from the right side no glimpse whatsoever of her face can be seen. It is terribly Frenchy and very chic, and consequently it matches the charming debutante.

Dunned at Bridge

If you were enjoying yourself at a fashionable card party, and you were called to the 'phone there to learn that the person to whom you were called wanted to know if you didn't think you should pay a certain bill contracted by a member of your family, wouldn't it jar you? I'm told that is precisely what happened to an estimable lady in Sausalito recently where she was playing bridge, and that she was so rattled by the occurrence that she immediately quit the game.

Debutante Luncheon

The luncheon given by Miss Jeanne Gallois in the gray room of the Fairmont last week was one of the most elaborate of the season. The table was exquisitely decorated in pink roses and autumn leaves. There were twenty-one guests, among whom were Miss Mary Keeney, Miss Dorothy Chapman, Miss Vera de Sabla, Miss Avis Sherwood, Miss Augusta Foute, Miss Innes Keeney, Miss Florence Hopkins, Miss Peggy Simpson, Miss Maud Wilson, Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick, Miss Clara Allen, the Misses Newhall, the Misses DuBois, Miss Ethel McAllister and Miss Elizabeth Woods. One of the most delightful luncheons given in honor of this season's debutantes was that of Mrs. James King Steele at which Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick and Miss Clara Allen were the guests of honor. Covers for twenty were laid in the gray room of the Fairmont and the table was beautifully decorated in pink roses with corsage bouquets of baby roses for each guest. Among those who assembled to meet these very popular young women were Miss Augusta Foute, Miss Florence Breckenridge, Miss Elizabeth Simpson, Miss Helen Du Bois, Miss Erna St. Goar, Miss Dolly MacGavin, Miss Lowe, Miss MacRae, Miss Ethel Shorb, Miss Olive Craig, Miss Macia Fee, Miss Maye Coburn, Miss Emily Du Bois, Miss Innes Keeney, Miss Mary Keeney, Mrs. James E. Abbott and Mrs. Henry T. Ferguson. After the luncheon the hostess and her guests attended the matinee dance given by the officers aboard the French cruiser Catinat.

The Morrison Sisters Entertain

The Misses Morrison of San Jose are among the most frequent visitors to the city during the social season and entertain lavishly during their stay. Their apartments at the Fairmont are always in readiness for them. They have been the hostesses at a series of pretty teas in the Laurel Court of the Fairmont during the last week. On Tuesday they entertained representatives of the army. Their guests were Colonel and Mrs. John Lundeen, General and Mrs. George R. Smith, Captain and Mrs. Cranston and Captain Lockwood. On Thursday their guests were of the judiciary, including Judge Holden, Judge and Mrs. Weller, while on Saturday they divided honors

Social Gossip from Berkeley

The Hotel Carlton in Berkeley has been the scene of much gaiety during the past fortnight. On Thursday of last week Mr. and Mrs. Edgar R. Lewis, of New Bedford, Conn., who have been spending several weeks at the hotel, entertained at dinner a number of friends, complimentary to Captain and Mrs. H. H. Stout. Among their other guests were General and Mrs. Woodruff, Mr. and Mrs. George Tripp, Miss Grace C. Tripp and Mrs. E. L. Vinal of the United States Coast Survey. The marriage of Miss Tripp and Mr. Vinal was celebrated on Saturday in the Unitarian church in Berkeley and following the ceremony a breakfast was served at the Hotel Carlton. The Pacific Coast branch of the American Historical Association of which James D. Phelan is the president, held their fifth annual convention in Berkeley on Saturday and during the noon intermission lunched at the Carlton, and on Saturday night thirty members of the Minnesota Alumni enjoyed a banquet in the private dining room of the hotel. Thanksgiving was the occasion of a number of dinner parties at the Carlton, among the hostesses of that day being Mrs. Henry Rogers, who entertained about fifteen friends in honor of Mrs. Farmer and Miss Hazel Farmer of Santa Rosa, who are visiting her. Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Wood entertained a party of eight and there were several other merry little dinner parties. An orchestra furnished music during the meal and later in the evening there was an informal dance for the guests of the hotel and their friends.

McAllister at the Orpheum

Hall McAllister of the Pacific Union Club is worth the price of admission at the Orpheum this week. The bare idea of a member of the Pacific Union Club contributing to the merriment of an Orpheum audience is in itself screamingly ludicrous. The Pacific Union Club is popularly believed to be the haunt of solemnity, the abiding place of frigid dignity, where, in the midst of June one feels December, and whence no laughter ever emanates save that which is sepulchral. Of the typical Pacific Unioner it is said that he will be pompous even in his grave, and that if he were suddenly possessed by a sense of humor he would die of humiliation. That the popular impression is inaccurate one may learn by witnessing "The Girl of the Times" at the Orpheum. This is the sketch in which Hall McAllister is appearing with most gratifying success. Before going on the stage Mr. McAllister spent nearly all his leisure in the Pacific Union Club and apparently the atmosphere thereof was not fatal. The Orpheum has an exceptionally strong bill this week with McAllister, Raymon and Caverly, Lew Hawkins and the Four Orans.

Another "College" Comedy

George Ade's farcical comedy, "Just Out of College," now on at the American is just that and nothing more or less—a comedy shot full of farce. It was written to provoke laughter that need not be restrained by doubt of the congruity of purpose or an effort by even the judicious to avoid grieving because the motive is otherwise futile. The actors live up to the intention of the play—they fit their fantastic environment, and what more can we ask of those who know so well how to make us forget for an hour or two that there are more tragedies than comedies in the drama of real life. The story of the comedy is evidently in line with an effort to perpetuate the success of Ade's "College Widow." The substance of this play, however, is not as firm as that of the original comedy, but it is a glittering pendant to hang in the pink-tipped ear of the "Widow." It is full of bright sayings, catchy topical songs, hilarious lines, witty gags and exaggerated characterization; and what more can we demand from those who merely promise to furnish us with an evening's funn and merriment, full measure and running over?

Adele Verne's Art

Christian Science Hall was nearly filled last Sunday afternoon when Adele Verne stepped upon the stage to greet the people who, upon her American debut just a year ago, were captivated by the peculiarly fascinating quality of pianistic art. Her opening number the thirty-two variations of Beethoven, displayed at once a greater degree of mastery over her instrument and surety of herself than she possessed last year, but aside from that no other trace of change was apparent in her playing. In the Beethoven number, as well as in the Mendelssohn Scherzo and the two charming Scarlatti sonatas which followed, there was the same dignity of reading and admirable adherence to the text that have hitherto characterized Miss Verne's interpretations of the classics, while the Gluck-Szambrati "Melodie" revealed the beautiful and colorful tonal qualities that make her art so very alluring. The nine "Forest Scenes" of Schumann belong to the last period of his creative activity and are, like his other compositions of that time, of less musical import than his earlier works; but Miss Verne's deep musical feeling brought forth all of their beauties, notably in the "Hunting Song" and "Bird as Prophet." But the chiefest charm of this pianist, her splendid and exhilarating temperament, found its most natural outlet in the Brahms "Rhapsodie," with its smoldering passion and bursts of gloomy climax, and the Liszt E major Polonaise. Her version of the Polonaise was of magnificent proportions and one to remain long in the memory, and quite justified the thunderous applause that succeeded it. Such performances as these, added to Miss Verne's unforgettable interpretation of the Chopin B flat minor sonata on her first visit to us place her securely at the head of all pianists of her sex in spite of her youth. And what sort of an artist will this girl of superb talent and fine mentality be when she reaches her thirties? Truly a pleasant speculation. Four encores were graciously added to the above program, a repetition of the Mendelssohn Scherzo, a Handel "Minuett," Alkan's "Le Vent" and "Etude" by Diemer.

The Play of the Hour

The manager of the "Paid in Full" company which is to appear at the Van Ness next week is not one of the cynics of theatredom that sneer at dramatic criticism. "There are thousands of people in this country," he says, "who never go to see a play until it has been endorsed by their favorite critic." And he adds: "It is no exaggeration to say that hundreds of plays have gone on the rocks simply because the critics condemned them." Speaking of "Paid in Full" he says: "To find the critics of New York and Chicago unanimous is a rare thing, but that is what they are on the subject of this play of contemporary life in America. All critics have pronounced it the play of the hour." A specially organized company

Arthur Hartmann, the Great Violinist

Next Sunday afternoon, November 29, at Christian Science Hall, Arthur Hartmann, the famous violin virtuoso, composer, writer and all-round musician will make his debut before a San Francisco audience. Hartmann is a musician of brains. His main object is to interpret the thought of the great masters and although he has a technique equal to any living virtuoso he uses it simply as a means to an end. He is a musician of the Kreisler and Ysaye type. At this first concert he will be heard in all classes of violin work. For his opening number he has chosen the big and noble G minor Concerto by Max Bruch. After this he will play the "Prelude and Fugue" in G minor by Bach for violin unaccompanied. For lighter works he will play the "Cradle Song" by MacDowell, "Une Pensee," by Arthur Nevin and a "Rhapsodie" of his own composition. For those who care for the brilliant technical performances he will close with the "Faust Fantasie" by Wieniawski. Mr. Alfred Calzin, the pianist with Mr. Hartmann, is not a mere accompanist but a virtuoso player, and his numbers will include the Chopin "Scherzo in B minor" and "Etude Op. 10, No. 3, Liszt's" "Rhopsodie No. 15," "La Nuit" by Glazounow and an "Etude" by de Schloezer. At the second concert, which will be given Thursday evening, December 3, Mr. Hartmann's numbers will be the Mendelssohn concerto, "Grand Fugue in A minor," by Bach, Wieniawski's "Russian Airs," "Zephyr" by Hubay, "Mazurka" by Zarzycki and "Allegro de Concert e Cadenz" by Paganini-Hartman. Mr. Calzin's numbers will include a Schumann sonata. The last concert will be given Sunday afternoon, December 6. Seats and complete programs may be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co's stores. On Friday afternoon, December 4, Hartman will play in Oakland at "Ye Liberty Playhouse."

"The Little Minister" to be Revived

J. M. Barrie's delightful romantic comedy, "The Little Minister," made famous by Maude Adams, will be revived by the Alcazar players next Monday evening. Of all the Barrie writings there is, perhaps, none more entertaining than this picturesque story of life in a Scotch village, nor has the stage ever presented a sprightlier or more winsome character than that of Lady Babbie, the girl whose fanciful notions form the background of the tale. It was by her interpretation of Lady Babbie that Miss Adams first established herself as one of the country's leading actresses. The story of "The Little Minister" is undoubtedly well known to the majority of theatre-goers, but for those who have neither seen the play nor read the book, it may be as well to give a brief outline of it. The scenes are laid in one of the rural districts of Scotland, a small manufacturing town, over the destinies of which presides a youthful minister. The male members of the kirk are at odds with their employers, and a detachment of redcoats is sent to the town to apprehend the leaders. Lady Babbie, the daughter of Lord Rintoul, is anxious to warn the people against the arrival of the soldiers, so, adopting the costume of a gypsy, she ventures forth into the night to sound the alarm. Fate throws her into the path of the little minister, and, despite the girl's heathenish garb, he falls madly in love with her. Lady Babbie, without disclosing her identity, prevails upon the minister to give the signal which will warn the village of the soldiers. To please the girl the minister gives this signal without realizing what he is doing, and, although he has at all times counselled a peaceful surrender to the authorities, he is in this way innocently instrumental in frustrating the plans of the soldiers. The result of this act is a complicated state of affairs, to which is added the mystery surrounding the identity of the little girl who has induced the minister to perform an act of treason. And not until the minister has been subjected to all the tortures that a man in love can possibly experience does the malicious Lady Babbie come to his rescue by disentangling the confusion which she had brought about.

ARTHUR HARTMANN

The Nordica Concerts

The inquiry for seats for the two concerts to be given at the Van Ness Theatre Sunday afternoons, December 13 and 20, by Lillian Nordica, has been so large that Manager Greenbaum announces he will open a mail order sale at once. Seats will be $2.50, $2.00, $1.50 and $1.00. Orders enclosing checks or money orders will receive careful attention in the order received. Address Will L. Greenbaum at Sherman, Clay & Co's. Nordica's only evening appearance will be under the auspices of the St. Francis Musical Art Society. Her Oakland concert will be given at Ye Liberty Playhouse.

Princess Theatre

Next Sunday night Kolb and Dill will conclude a run of five weeks in "Playing the Ponies," and next Monday night they will present for the first time on any stage another story with music by Aaron Hoffman and J. A. Raynes, entitled Weiner and Schnitzel. Great things are predicted for the new play, which deals with the adventures of two Dutch brewers who have succumbed to the tender passion and concluded to wed their affinities in the Statue of Liberty. The Justice of the Peace who is also a phrenologist and jack of all trades, mixes up things by marrying each of the women to the wrong husband. The Dutchmen soon discover that matrimony is not what it is cracked up to be and drown their sorrows in the flowing bowl. After a prolonged spree they take refuge from the rain in a Turkish bath house which has recently been a young ladies' seminary. The cast of Weiner and Schnitzel will include Billy Clifford, Maud Lambert and the entire Kolb and Dill company, which will be further strengthened by the addition of Sarah Edwards, Marie Howe, Sydney de Grey and Harry Cashman.

Adela Verne's Farewell Concert

The last concert of that wonderful pianiste, Adele Verne, will be given this Saturday afternoon at Christian Science Hall at 2:30. An exceptionally interesting and beautiful program has been arranged. By special request the artist will give her wonderful interpretation of the Chopin "Sonata" Op. 35, the one with the glorious funeral march. Mendelssohn's "Variations Seriuses" and "Rondo Capriceioso," two Hungarian dances by Brahms, the paraphrases on "Rigoletto" and the "Song to the Evening Star" by Liszt and the same composer's "Dance of the Gnomes" will be interesting features, while the two novelties will be a "Staccato Etude" by Alice Bredt-Verne, a sister of the performer, and "Elegie" Op. 1, No. 1, by Albert I. Elkus, the talented young Californian. Seats may be secured at Sherman, Caly & Co's until one o'clock Saturday afternoon, after which they will be on sale at the box office of the hall.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The program for next week at the Orpheum makes an appeal which should prove irresistible. Among the new attractions are Castellane and brother, two daring acrobats and cyclists who during the past two years have been a sensational feature in New York. The Castellanes perform a number of extraordinary feats which they declare to be entirely safe, but which certainly appear most daring and dangerous. Their concluding feat, a double somersault in midair, is the most spectacular performance ever accomplished on a bicycle. In this both riders at the same time descend a steep incline and turn somersaults on the bicycles as they travel through space after leaving the track round which they have sped. Miss Felice Morris, daughter of the late Felix Morris, one of the most justly celebrated of character actors, will present a one-act comedy by Frances Wilson, "The Old, Old Story." Harry Linton and Anita Laurence will present a pretty light comedy sketch called "Married Now," with just enough plot to hold together a charming dancing and singing arrangement. Happy Jack Gardner, singing comedian and clever musician, who has become one of the most popular monologists in the country, will indulge in novel and witty parodies. Next week will be the last of Raymond and Caverly and the Four Orans. Hall McAllister will conclude his engagement in his bright comedy, "The Girl of the Times." With the coming program George W. Leslie and his merry makers will also conclude their engagement, in "The Naked Truth," which is proving one of the greatest successes the Orpheum has known. A new series of motion pictures will impart interest and amusement to a most delightful bill.

Valencia's New Stock Company

The opening of the winter season at the Valencia Theatre will be made memorable by an elaborate production of "Aristocracy," Bronson Howard's greatest drama. The play will be handsomely mounted and lavishly costumed and in every way the performance Sunday night will resemble another opening such as aroused San Francisco's theatregoers on that other evening last September when many records for fashionable audiences and perfect productions were broken. Signalizing the return of the stock company and in a measure forecasting the future policy of the playhouse will be the appearance for the first time as leading woman of the Valencia stock company of Miss Blanch Stoddard, together with a half dozen other established favorites fresh from engagements in New York and Chicago. Miss Stoddard will be best remembered as leading woman for Margaret Anglin, with whom she appeared at the old California Theatre just before the fire. Prior to that she was the leading woman for fifty weeks at the old Grand Opera House. She has played leading roles with Nazimova, Henry Miller, Sir Henry Irving, William Gillette and many other notable stars and has played leading engagements under the management of Charles Frohman for a number of seasons. Besides Miss Stoddard other new members of the company are Miss Helen Lackaye, sister of Wilton Lackaye; Miss Beatrice Nichols, formerly ingenue at the Bush Temple in Chicago; Guy Darrell Standing, a clever English actor; Gerald Harcourt, a finished light comedian and Thomas MacLarnie, who comes direct from a notable run in the Bush Temple, Chicago, where he made a tremendous success in the leading roles. The entire company will appear in "Aristocracy," and the new members are all cast in roles which will afford them the best of opportunities to show their worth.

STEVENS-DURYEA 1909 RUNABOUT

Letters

Anecdotes of Lincoln

Perhaps, as long as the American Republic shall last, the slightest and smallest incident in the life of Abraham Lincoln will be inspiration for a book of some sort. "The Boyhood of Lincoln" is one of the latest additions to the "Lincoln Library." It contains about sixty pages of wandering reminiscence by Dennis Hanks, told to Eleanor Atkinson and preserved in print by her. Dennis Hank's was a cousin of Lincoln's, and raised with him. He was some years older and able to remember for himself the advent of the future president, but apart from the words being spoken by one who knew the facts at first hand there is nothing new to be gleaned, unless perhaps, a new attitude with regard to the extreme poverty and hardship suffered by the Lincoln-Hanks people. One gathers from old Dennis that they were not in greater stress than their neighbors. George Washington did not miss the telephone, an automobile nor a private car and Alexander the Great was never defeated because his powder was damp. McClure's are the publishers of this latest Lincoln booklet.

On the Beauties of Nature

The Paul Elder Company has made of Stanton Davis Kirkham's essays, "In the Open," a book to tempt the eye, and satisfy the mind. Mr. Kirkham is not laying down laws nor teaching facts, nor insisting on the notebook and visible display of trophies in the shape of concrete observations. Evidently he is of those who do not miss the beauty of the woods by too close contemplation of the trees. His is the larger outlook which makes of a walk something more than health-preserving constitutional, of a bird more than a mere feathered biped and of a plant more than an edible or inedible vegetable. "Nature is in herself a perpetual invitation to the open. The woods are an unfailing resource; the mountains and the sea companionable. To count among one's friends the birds and flowers and trees is surely worth while; for to come upon a new flower is then in the nature of an agreeable event, and a chance meeting with a bird may lend a pleasant flavor to the day." "A flock of wild geese on the wing is no less than an inspiration. When that strong-voiced, stout-hearted company of pioneers passes overhead, our thoughts ascend and sail with them over the roofs of the world. As band after band comes into the field of vision—minute glittering specks in the distant blue—to cross the golden sea of the sunset and disappear in the northern twilight, their faint melodious honk is an Orphean strain drawing irresistibly." Of Wild Gardens, he tells us, The Ways of the Ants, Winter Woods, Signs of Spring, Pasture Stones, Mountains, Forest and Sea. The frontispiece is a colored reproduction of a flight of wild geese by Louis Agassiz Fuertes. Other illustrations are photographs by Rudolph Eckenmeyer.

Romance of a Lost Mine

Romances of lost mines are so commonplace on the Pacific Coast that only those who invest their savings in searches for Cocos Island treasure and build castles in Spain out of the proceeds are apt to give more than passing heed to rumors. In New York, however, it is different, and therefore when Robert Hayden returned from Peru, where he had been building a railroad, in search not of a lost mine, for he had been fortunate enough to discover that, but of those who were its lawful owners, and without whose consent and co-operation he could make no use of his information, it was the beginning of a romance of mystery. The mine, which was no myth, was known as the Veiled Mariposa. Almost immediately after his arrival in New York Robert Hayden's attention was attracted by a beautiful society belle whose favorite adornments were butterflies in one form or another. There was some mystery about Marcia Oldham's income. When her father died, practically bankrupt, a few years before, it was assumed that she would be obliged to teach languages as a means of support for herself and her mother, instead of which she remained in New York, content to shine in society, and lived in the same style as before. Her partiality for butterflies had won for her the name of Silver Butterfly. Yet another butterfly flew into the open, for a mysterious fortune teller who preferred to meet her clients of the ultra fashionable set in a black masque and mantilla, was known as the "Veiled Mariposa." Some intuition guided Hayden to the belief that Marcia Oldham, the Silver Butterfly of society, as well as Ydo Carruthers. otherwise the Veiled Mariposa. were both in some way connected with the lost mine. Of couse it goes without saying that he was correct in his surmise and that he fell in desperate and deep love with one of the owners, and all the original mysteries, besides a few of later manufacture, were eventually cleared up. It has always been more or less of a mystery why the principal male characters of modern novels have been dubbed heroes, but it must be because of the courage they display in marrying the girls whose mothers are before them in the flesh to pose as warnings and awful examples of what the future may develop. "The Silver Butterfly" is a long way from Mrs. Woodrow Wilson's last book, "The New Missioner," which was located entirely in a Colorado mining camp. Published by Bobbs-Merrill. Illustrations by Christy.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC

Auto Notes

D. G. Doubleday, the well-known motorist, arrived this week from Los Angeles in his six-cylinder Thomas car. The tourist came by the Valley road and reports the touring fine. According to Doubleday, motor tourists going to the southern metropolis should take the Valley road, as the Coast route is badly washed by the recent rains, while the only obstacle on the interior road is the sand near Bakersfield. "We had no trouble on the way, and only had a few miles of deep sand to travel through," said the returning motorist. "I would advise you to take the Valley road." Doubleday, who has been living in Los Angeles, was accompanied by his family, and will make this city his future home.

Emile Adet, capitalist and artist of San Jose, spent several days this week in this city. He was accompanied by his wife and daughter and the round trip was made in their two-cylinder Buick touring car in which they had just returned from an extended tour of Southern California, which included a visit to Old Mexico.

One automobile man who is not worrying about the outlook in San Francisco is Mr. C. A. Hawkins, Western manager of the White Company. "The prospects for the coming season are certainly most encouraging," he remarked. "The number of interested people who called at our salesrooms is increasing every day and it looks very much like a banner year for us here. We are writing orders every day for 1909 cars, and since the twenty horse-power model, the miniature of the $4,000 forty horse-power car, has put in its appearance, have taken deposits for from one to as many as four a day. We have on our books three times as many advance orders as last year at this time, and I look to double our retail business this season without any difficulty whatever. Our new car has made the hit which we were confident it would, and before the season is over I am satisfied that it will again be the same old story with us: 'Demand was greater than the supply.'"

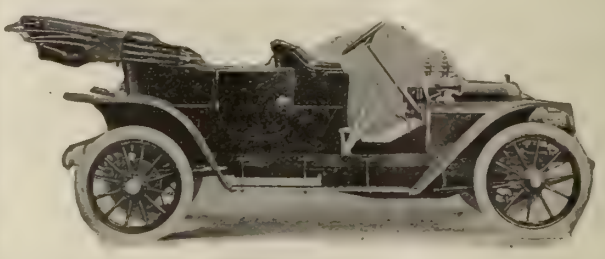
Mr. George A. Trout, western sales manager for the Cadillac motor, of Detroit, Michigan, has been in San Francisco all this week with the Cuyler Lee selling force. Mr. Trout reports immense sales of the Cadillac 30 throughout the West, and all the agents of the Cadillac are insistent in their demands for an increase of their allotment. As the ten thousand car product of the Cadillac is entirely sold out they are deemed to disappointment, but they have been promised an increase of their contracts next year, when the Cadillac Company expects to increase its product to fifteen or eighteen thousand cars.

An interesting model of the Chalmers-Detroit car arrived last week at the Pioneer Automobile Company. The new car, which has created a great deal of interest, is a 45-50 Chalmers-Detroit Roadster, capable of doing better than seventy-five miles an hour. The cylinders on the new car, and in fact, every important bearing of the new machine is equipped and finished with the object of speed. Calvin C. Eib, of the Pioneer Automobile Company, after a ten-mile speed test on the boulevard, says that the car is even faster than the famous Chalmers-Detroit Blue Bird, which broke the world's record at Fresno. The car is equipped with two gasoline tanks capable of carrying forty-six gallons, and an extra oil tank of four gallons capacity. Differing from the regular Chalmers-Detroit touring car, only in the extra boring of the cylinder and unusual gasoline and oil tanks, the car is expected to create a sensation in speed contests and hill-climbing events.

Fillmore street hill, on which the down trolley car raisesthe up-going trolley car by means of a cable provided at that point, is somewhat of a Waterloo for motor cars. When Mr. Trout first looked down this hill from the seat of a Cadillac 30 in spite of his faith in the car he begged not to be taken down, as he had never experienced anything like it in Detroit; but after the splendid little car had handsomely negotiated the hill both ways he wore "the smile that won't come off."

F. J. Lebert started for San Diego this week in his White steam car. He was accompanied by his wife, small son, and T. A. Churchill. If the weather does not become too threatening no attempt at a fast trip will be made, and the party will enjoy all of the splendid sight-seeing which the coast road affords. Mr. Lebert's machine is a 1905 model, and it has a mileage of 17,000.

Mr. O. H. Greenwald has just received from Cuyler Lee the first Packard "18" limousine to be delivered on the coast.



The first 1909 six-cylinder 70 horse-power Thomas arrived last week at the salesroom of the Pioneer Automobile Company. The machine, which is of the seven passenger touring car type, is rated at seventy-five miles an hour. There are few racing cars that can equal it in speed.

The model O White steam car performed a feat seldom attempted by cars of its power when it climbed the Fillmore street hill from Union street to Broadway on the day of its arrival. There were five passengers in the little twenty horse-power cars, and E. B. Waterman, the White Company representative of Fresno, was at the wheel. Waterman is not familiar with the city streets, and as he turned into Fillmore from Union street he was going at a low rate of speed. One of the passengers asked him to drive up the hill which confronted them, and he obeyed the request without going back for a running start. It was an anxious moment for the passengers, who knew the dangerous reputation of the steep incline, but the car never faltered, and was going as fast at the top as at the bottom.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA SEND GREETING TO Frederick L. Robinson, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County, or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's willful neglect of plaintiff on account of defendant's idleness, profligacy and dissipation, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that unless you appear and answer as above required the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 9th day of November, A. D. 1908.

According to A. C. Wheelock, Fresno representative of the Pioneer Automobile Company, the sale of motor cars in that territory for the season of 1909, will be confined to small cars, but a great many of the higher horse-power machines will be disposed of. "I have had a number of inquiries on the six-cylinder forty horsepower Thomas," said Wheelock in a letter yesterday to the local agents. "Several prospects who have been considering buying Chalmers-Detroits, have decided that they would just as soon have a big car, and have placed orders for early delivery of the 6-40 Thomas machines. Judging by the present outlook nearly as many high-powered motor cars will be sold in the raisin center as small machines."

The White Company has just issued an attractive booklet devoted to the White ambulances, patrol wagons and 'busses. Considerable space in the booklet is devoted to the ambulance used by the United States War Department and Navy Department and to the official government records recommending the White for this service. The ambulances owned by the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and Trenton also receive attention, the descriptive matter used in this connection being the letters from the superintendents of the several hospitals where the machines have been in use. Some space is given to the private ambulances, which have proved most profitable investments for auto-running concerns. The White patrol wagons, such as used by several cities in this country and abroad, are illustrated in the booklet and the various types of White 'busses, especially designed for hotel and livery service, receive due attention.

Mr. C. W. Judson has just taken delivery of his 1909 Packard "30" touring car.

Word has been received by the Pioneer Automobile Company to the effect that the first large shipment of six-cylinder forty horse-power Thomas cars will arrive this week. In the lot will be the tourist gentlemen's roadster and regular touring car models. A number of early orders have already been placed for these cars, and immediate delivery will be made.

Cuyler Lee has just delivered to Mrs. B. L. Welch a 1909 Packard touring car.

Carl Christensen, formerly engaged in the garage business at Watsonville, is now the Buick agent for Alameda county.

R. Masson Smith and wife returned to this city last week after completing a novel tour of Northern Mexico in their White steam car. It is nearly a month since the Smiths left their home in San Francisco to start on an automobile trip to Mexico and return. They traveled in their eighteen horse-power '06 model White steam car, which by an ingenious device of Mr. Smith can be made into a house on wheels. The back of the front seat is so constructed that it can be swung back at night, thus making comfortable sleeping quarters. With the side and storm curtains in place the Smiths were well provided for in any kind of weather, either at day or night. The weather has been so agreeable that they did not find it necessary to use these curtains at night. A Japanese boy accompanied them and acted as cook and general caretaker of the car. He slept in a hammock outside the car. Every convenience imaginable for a trip of this kind was carried in the machine. They carried a complete camping outfit, including guns and fishing tackle. When they came to a stream that suggested fishing or a good hunting place they simply stopped and enjoyed the sport until they felt inclined to journey on. At night they camped wherever they happened to be, and thus were not bothered by the lack of a good hotel or even the lack of any at all. The trip by the coast route from San Francisco to Los Angeles covered the first ten days, stops being made at Paso Robles, Del Monte, Santa Barbara, etc., but especially at all of the missions on the way and in several instances they went miles out of their way to see the ruins of an old mission. After spending some time in Los Angeles visiting friends and being entertained they left for San Diego over the road along the coast and, like their downward trip, they stopped at all points of interest, including the missions, whether they were on their course or some distance from it. At San Diego both before and after leaving for Mexico and on their return they spent several days taking side trips such as Coronado, La Jolla, Point Loma, etc. From San Diego the party spent a short time touring in their White in Mexico, but the roads were not good and not much of special interest could be seen without journeying farther into the southern wilds than their time would permit, the trip was shortened. They returned here from the seaport by the inland route, stopping at Lakeside, Elsinore, Oceanside, Redlands and other places of interest. Since quail season has opened Smith has several times neared the limit. The Smiths spent some little time on the Warner ranch and in the Temecula country; in several places in this region they drove their car where no other automobile had ever been. During part of the time spent in Southern California the Smiths were accompanied by Mrs. W. A. Irwin and Miss Allie Osborne. The Smiths returned by way of the Valley route, passing through Bakersfield, Fresno and Modesto. They made a side trip to Snelling, and then crossed the San Joaquin Valley to Banta and home by way of Livermore and Haywards. The trip of 2500 miles was made in a car which already has a mileage of 40,000. The trip was so successful that the tourists are already planning to tour the Orient in their veteran car next year.

1000 Cars Already Delivered

Touring Cars
Tourabouts
Roadsters

Chalmers-Detroit "30"

"It's a Good Car"

A high-grade 4-cylinder, 5-passenger, 24-30 horse-power car, made by the makers of the Thomas-Detroit Forty.

Price $1500

"The only man who doesn't praise the Chalmers "30" is the man who doesn't own one."

806 of our $1500 "30's" have been delivered up to this date (October 31st, 1908). Not last year's models, but all of them built this year.

806 people are actually running these cars.

806 people know they are the best $1500 cars made, because they have proved them out by use.

806 people will tell you so if you ask them. And after all, are they not the best judges? Some are nearby you — some are your neighbors, perhaps. Ask them what they think. We will gladly abide by their judgment.

If you doubt our word, get hold of a mechanical engineer—let him examine and test the other cars and then ours. Take his word—we will rest our claim on that.

Our car is built by engineers who have designed more successful medium-priced cars than anyone else; engineers who put their names in print and stand back of their designs and statements with their reputations.

Any competent engineer will tell you that these men have now made the best low-priced car on the market.

Remember, 806 of these cars have been delivered already. They are our salesmen. Salesmen of other companies won't tell you the good points of our cars. They are not paid to do that. Don't expect them to do it. Advertising writers are paid enormous salaries to make other cars look good in print. Our cars look good to engineers—look good on the road —look good to people who use them—will look good to you if you will look. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. 806 people "are eating theirs now."

These Facts are Important

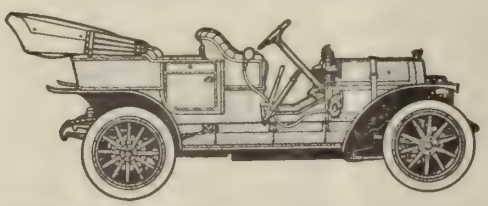
Our "30" car has the specifications known to belong to real touring cars. 110-inch wheel base, close coupled body, hung in the middle of the car, not away out over the rear axle to make room for a "big handsome hood" that don't make the car run, the hood isn't important —it's the engine under the hood. Ours is right, engineers will tell you so, multiple disc clutch, three speed transmission, floating rear axle, ½ elliptic springs, quick detachable tires, etc.

One of our $1500 cars has been running 200 miles a day for 91 days. This run is from Detroit to Pontiac and back, and the car goes every day, rain or shine. 18,200 miles have been run so far without a miss, right on schedule, and it is still running. If you know anyone in Detroit, write to them to verify this statement. No other car at any price has ever done this before. That's the kind we sell. That's the kind 806 people are using now.

At the Sweepstake Races run over the Vanderbilt Cup course on Saturday, October 10th, our cars won first and second in their class, distancing everybody else, beating the next car 34 minutes, which means that our car was more than 25 miles ahead in a race of 150 miles. The "30" that won first averaged 48 miles per hour on this course, and the "30" that won second averaged 46 miles per hour.

The car that won the Vanderbilt Cup Race on Saturday, October 24th, averaged 64 miles per hour, which was record-breaking time. In comparison with this specially built racing car consider our "30", selling for $1500, averaging 48 miles per hour over this same course. We more than lapped every one of our competitors in the Sweepstake Race. Do you want any better evidence that our car is absolutely right, that our two-bearing crank shaft and our cylinders cast en bloc are the very best construction?

The consistent performance of the two cars shows it was not luck that won for us. One averaged 48 miles per hour, the other 46 miles. Further than that, the car that won second in this race was driven by a man who had never seen the car until an hour before he drove it in the race. We had to get a new driver because the driver we had was disqualified the day before the race because he hit a cow on the course. This car that hit the cow had only the radiator damaged and went into the race the next day and won second.



Our cars in this race were stock cars. There are 806 cars just like them running on the streets and roads of this country. We don't build special cars for racing purposes and build other cars to deliver to our customers. The cars we deliver to customers are the same cars that we enter in races.

In a Nutshell

We have sold 3047 cars to dealers, 806 of these have already been delivered. We are shipping from 15 to 18 cars a day.

Chalmers-Detroit "Forty" Touring Car, $2750

The Chalmers-Detroit "Forty" is a dandy car, as a thousand users know. It is by all odds the best medium-priced car on the market.

The day of mere extravagance in automobile buying is over. People nowadays will not pay $4000 or $5000 merely for the purpose of saying that they spent that much for an automobile.

What more could you get for $4000 or $5000 than you can get in the Chalmers-Detroit "Forty" at $2750? More power, and more weight, perhaps. Why more power? The "Forty" will do anything that any other car will do. As far as more weight is concerned, it will merely add to the cost of upkeep.

The "Forty" is the speediest, quietest, most economical car of its class. It has won first place as a hill climber; it has won dozens of contests in speed and endurance.

So, far, we have delivered 178 of the 1909 "Forty." Our capacity for the year is only 500. Last year we ran about 200 short of the demand, and there is sure to be a shortage this year. So that if you want a "Forty" please place your order now, either for immediate delivery or for future delivery.

Made in two styles — touring car and roadster — $2750.

The Philanthropic Rockefeller

Under the microscope John D. Rockefeller does not appear so black as he has been painted. No man is either a god or a brute, and the Standard Oil King is a man. On microscopic examination it appears that Mr. Rockefeller has high ideals up to which he tries to live. In this respect he is no better than the average man; nor in any respect is he worse than the average man. We all have our ideals and we all fail to realize them. There is constant warfare in every man between the spiritual and the physical. That Mr. Rockefeller seems worse than the average man is due to the exceptional magnitude of his potentiality for evil. His morals have been impaired in the degree in which he has accumulated power. He has made power the object and end of existence, and so has the average man. Money is the symbol and principle of power, and that is why we all love it; that is why we waste our lives in the pursuit thereof. Mr. Rockefeller having unparalleled talent for the attainment of what he conceives to be the end and object of existence has amassed so great a fortune that today he is the most powerful man in the United States. That he has abused his power we all know, but where is the mortal to be found of whom it may truthfully be said that were it possible for him to possess himself of all the power which John D. Rockefeller has accumulated, in the course of the prodigious struggle for supremancy he would have fewer transgressions to repent. The fact is that John D. Rockefeller is a man of very good intentions but of very bad instincts. We have no reason to doubt the sincerity of his philanthropic professions. It is entirely credible that he is deeply concerned for the welfare of others, and that from sympathy for less favored mortals he has done much toward improving industrial conditions, but unfortunately the whole mass of his spiritual and intellectual virtues has been frustrated by his consuming passion for money which he has been too well able to indulge. All the good that he has done or that he is capable of doing cannot balance the evil that has sprung from his exploits. With Mammon as his prophet, his god the golden calf, he represents that rapacious hunger for money which has become a serious problem in the life of the nation, and he is responsible for practices the mischievous consequences of which are not soon to be obliterated.

Duty of the Women Students

The sempiternal ebullition at Stanford University manifests itself this week in a protest by the young women students against certain restrictions that have been placed upon them by their dean, Mrs. Evelyn Wright Allan. It is apparently assumed by the protestants that they are collectively and severally capable of judging for themselves what may be the proper and maidenly expression in their conduct and especially in the matter of what they shall wear. They object to the edict of their dean that they shall not wander away alone into the by-ways and lanes of Palo Alto with male students, because the admonition infringes on the promise of the "house mothers" who are supposed to exercise maternal supervision of all such association, prescribing time, place and duration, and passing upon the suitability of the squires of demoiselles. As to the dean's interdiction of crepitatory underskirts, stockings in pastel and peek-aboo waists, the girls are unanimous in their opinion that all sumptuary prescription in this regard is impertinent, therefore superfluous and of no avail. Ordinarily the attitude of these young women concerning their action and their apparel would be impregnable. In their home life they are answerable only to their parents; but if they are dutiful daughters they are absolutely amenable to the strictest discipline that may be prescribed by those who have the natural and legal right to regulate their conduct and to provide their raiment. When these young women go out from their home life they are still subject to the sovereignty of the home. The circumstance that they are separated from the direct influence of home life and home discipline does not absolve them from compliance with any reasonable demand that may be made upon them in matters that would have been similarly regulated at home. When a young woman goes to college she does not thereby emancipate herself from parental control, nor does she achieve the "independence" that is presumed to attach to womanhood in its maturity. In truth, the young woman at college is necessarily more closely within the purview and discipline of the delegated authority of the college than she was under the direct and intimate authority of the home. The college authority is of right more jealous of its prescriptive sovereignty over its woman students than is parental authority. The responsibility of the faculty of a co-educational institution in guarding its feminine student body from harm in morals, association and their own folly, is greater than that which falls upon the parent, because it is an assumed responsibility. It is a responsibility that includes not only the good name and the modest demeanor of the women students, but looks to the fair fame of the institution itself. This responsibility is peculiar to co-educational colleges and universities. It does not rest upon institutions devoted wholly to the education of men. However flagrant may be the conduct of men students, the fame of the college does not suffer. But the expulsion from college of one woman for conduct unbecoming a woman student would blight the prospects of the college as a co-educational institution, almost irremediably. Therefore it may be concluded that any protest by the young women of Stanford in opposition to any decree by the dean of the women students, however drastic or sumptuary, is untenable. It is assumed that the decree would not have been issued if it were unnecessary, and it is not within the province of the students to determine its validity. It should be obeyed as implicity and with as little questioning as if it were the mandate of direct parental authority.

Arranging a Commercial Partition

It may be a little early to discuss the American-Japanese alliance reported with such verisimilitude from Washington. However, as the "agreement" is announced in all the newspapers there must be some truth in it; but it is incomplete. For one matter we are not informed whether it is an American-Japanese alliance or a Japanese-American alliance. This is important as it will indicate, when the information is vouchsafed, whether the proposition came originally from the Japanese or from the White House. If it was proposed by Japan we may rest assured that its operation will redound to the profit of Japan in a larger degree than to the Americans. If the treaty was hatched in the White House it may still profit the little brown fellows more than it will profit us, for it will almost inevitably have been a by-product of one of "my policies," to be passed on to the Taft administration and ratified by a subservient Senate. It is yet to be determined whether any or all of these "policies" are potential with profit for the American commonwealth. It is stated that the "agreement" is not exactly a treaty but has been drawn up in the form of a "declaration," and we may therefore infer that it is merely a protocol and only tentative in its immediate purpose. The real thing will come after the respective parties to the contract have learned what their constituents think of the proposition. Primarily the pact is to conserve and preserve the commerce of the Pacific by "encouraging its free and peaceful development," and "the maintenance of the existing status quo in the Pacific," which is queer tautology in the diction of a carefully considered State paper. The meat of this diplomatic cocoanut, however, is within the hard shell of its international comity. The agreement thus entered upon between the present occupants of the White House of America and the wily far under reaching statesmen of the Mikado's empire sets forth, as reported in the newspapers, that the United States and Japan express their determination "in the common interest of all the powers" to support "by all peaceful means at their disposal" the independence and integrity of China and the principle of equal commercial and industrial opportunity for all nations in the empire. This is all very well for Japan and the United States and "the powers," but, in the language of the street, where does China get off or come in? It does not appear on the surface of the event that the party of the third part has been consulted in the matter at all. It is possible, of course, that the recent embassy from China to this country, ostensibly to thank us for remitting a portion of the loot that fell to our share after the Boxer emeute, is really an authorized commission to accept whatever the parties of the first and second part may see fit to accord under this apparently jug-handled "agreement," "declaration" or whatever its framers may see fit to call it. Most of the commerce of the Pacific will come from or be transported to China, and it would seem that in all fairness and in strict accordance with the "square deal" so loudly proclaimed from the roof top of the White House and so vociferously re-echoed in the great heart of the American people, China should have been asked if she was willing to have this commerce and "industrial opportunity" in that country monopolized, controlled and operated by outsiders. We hope, in any event, that the White Householder and the Japanese statesmen are going through the perfunctory form of saying to China, "By your leave." There would be a deuce of a hullaballoo if it were proposed to "parcel" the Middle Kingdom into definite "spheres of influence," but there will probably be no objection whatever to this method of arriving at the same end. "Spheres of influence" are individual monopolies of the "agreeing" nations; but in the distribution some of the parcelling "powers" are sure to get larger slices than others; so it has been decided to go at it in another way by "agreeing" to support "the principle of equal opportunity for commerce and industry in China." Poor old China! Boob of nations! Verily thy glory and thy self respect departed with Kublai and Ghenghis and the terror of thy hordes trampling the power of Europe beneath their invading feet!

The Literary Man's Lot

Richard Le Gallienne is lamenting the hard lot of the literary man. He is regarded as a superfluity in these commercial days, and there is more room in the world for the stockbroker and the burglar than there is for the maker of books. True it is, but no particular pity, for the average book is as futile and useless as the gimcracks which are painted or pasted together by ladies of decayed gentility and foisted upon victimized purchasers who cannot escape the importunities. Nine-tenths of the books which are put forth every year are but feeble echoes of something else, and too often the something else was unwanted. The old story which used to be told as a characterization of the English gentleman: "It's a glorious morning. Let's go out and kill something" needs but to be paraphrased to fit the case of the average writer. "Here are pen and paper. I'll write something." There is a certain type of mind, endowed with the capacity to produce words as a leaky faucet drips water. A child endowed with this quality is invariably called "gifted," and throughout his school days is encouraged to cultivate the superficial talent. On any and every occasion he falls into the ink bottle, and it is assumed by all and several that he must be an author. The result is that every time he takes a walk or reads a book the unprotected public is made to suffer the infliction of his views and opinions. Like the electric piano, he needs but to be started. Somebody touches the button and there is no relief but in headlong flight. Sense he does not consider, but he revels in words, words and still more words, varied by lamentations at the lack of appreciation with which he and his kind are received. Now a tradesman or handicraftsman, before he sets up in business will first consider the situation. Is there business enough to offer a fair chance for another man, and can I get my share of what there is? Can I increase the demand for the particular thing I can do, or shall I but enter into a scramble for a bite of the half-loaf? Not so the writer. The materials of his trade, (for trade it is more than half the time), cost but little, and his time is his own, while, like other mere laborers, he is satisfied with a copy or an imitation. If it is as good or nearly as good as his model he sees no reason why it should not be as much in demand, and the result is that we have "poetry" by the mile which is nothing more than tinkle-tinke; essays which are but streams of words cut into length; novels which can be unerringly classified, and are as much alike as clothespins, and as in the days of Solomon, "of the making of books there is no end." Of a truth, the world would scarcely be a loser if all the writers existent were to turn their attention to some other occupation. There are books enough, and good books enough to satisfy every reasonable demand, and the law of the survival of the fittest works unerringly. It would prove a far greater disaster if the art of making paper or manufacturing pens and ink were to be suddenly lost. If the army of mechanics who now make and put together the machinery in use for producing books and newspapers should drop out of existence it would be a more serious business to train their successors to efficiency than it would be to find new scribblers and scratchers. The fifth and sixth rate purveyors of literary pabulum seem to lose sight of one patent fact, namely, that a book once put into concrete form lives forever. Cloth and clothing wear out; houses decay; fuel is destroyed; building material decays and food is consumed. The long, slow process of evolution, lasting through centuries of time, is necessary ere they may again come into use, but thoughts and ideas, once committed to print, may be reproduced unendingly. A dinner may be eaten but once; a book may be read a thousand times. Imperative hunger may compel one to eat what is not otherwise appetizing, and cold may counsel the utilization of any garment, but there is no obligation to read. The writer who wins recognition must fight his way against opposition and literally force his work on the attention. If he cannot he would better dig ditches than complain of that for which he alone is to blame.

The Muzzling of the Press

A writer in the New York Evening Post reminds us that Bishop Butler once speculated on the possibility of an entire nation going mad; and he says that while this peril is not so remote as some would think, far this side of outright mania there are dangers in the shape of invincible prejudices, unfounded opinions and baseless sentiments which take the form of an obsession and prevent the mind from working clearly or naturally. "To cultivate open-mindedness," says the same writer, "and to secure the free play of the intellect upon all subjects, have been adduced as the chief end of education." And he adds "that anything which prevents us from discussing all public questions on the basis of reason, is a sign of defective education." All of which, in our opinion, might have been inspired by things that have happened of late in San Francisco where we have a League of Justice composed of gentlemen who profess a high regard for the welfare of the city, but who call mass-meetings in the midst of great public excitement, ostensibly for the purpose of assuaging feverish impulses, and who undertake, under a democratic form of government, to interdict free discussion by destroying the liberty of the press. Upon the spirit that inspires organizations of this kind we do not care to animadvert at this time; nor should we take up for discussion the chief principle of the League of Justice were it not for the circumstance that among its members are representatives of the faculties of two institutions that are known as universities. We conceive it to be of some significance that here in California are men recognized as educators who affirm publicly their opposition to what the writer in the Evening Post declares to be the chief end of education: that is, the cultivation of open-mindedness and the free play of the intellect. The enunciation of this principle by a representative of the so-called university from which Professor Ross was dismissed is not surprising as it is pretty generally known that in Palo Alto the right of private judgment was long since extinguished, and that the atmosphere of the village is precisely what the atmosphere of Massachusetts was in the days when frightful persecutions were carried on systematically against Baptists, and Quakers and Catholics, and when Roger Williams, for merely suggesting to the public authorities of the colony that no person ought to be punished on account of his opinions, was driven into the woods and pursued ever afterward with a ferocity that put his own life and that of his friends in constant danger. It is not surprising, we repeat, that at Palo Alto there should be men calling themselves educated, usurping the authority of the educated while impeaching their own pretensions by energizing the principle that it is just to discourage freedom of conscience, and to impair the liberty of the press by advocating a boycott against journals whose crimes consist in setting forth arguments that cannot be refuted. The really significant and surprising phenomenon, and the one deserving reflection, is that employees of the State itself should be engaged in the practices of the infamous Court of Star Chamber, that arbitrary court of systematized tyranny into which the press was cited to answer for the odious offence of attempting to enlighten mankind. This we conceive to be a startling phenomenon and one to which, in our opinion, the next Legislature ought to give some attention. A conspiracy against the press aided and abetted by employees of the State is surely no trivial matter. Among the principles with which this government is inspired is one that affirms that where the press is enslaved government acts on delusion and the people on their passions. And De Tocqueville in his excellent work on "Democracy in America" tells us that it is an axiom of political science in this country that "the only way to neutralize the effect of public journals is to multiply them indefinitely thus to secure a wide diversity of opinion"; for, as he also says, "it has been demonstrated by observation and discovered by the innate sagacity of the pettiest as well as the greatest of despots, that the influence of a power is increased in proportion as its direction is rendered more central." Now what do we find a few of our California university professors attempting in this city? Apparently their purpose is to centralize the power of the press and to extinguish the right of private judgment. Apparently what they hope to achieve is unanimity of opinion, thus to safeguard against criticism a little band of self-anointed patriots who are now in control of all the machinery of government, and of whom it is now admitted even by their warmest admirers that they have transcended the bounds of decency and justice and are deserving of palliation only because they are actuated by the most beneficent motives. Are these learned educators who would confine the voice of the press to a single megaphone actuated by concern for the public welfare? If so then in the role of educators they are the most transparent of pretenders. The chief end of education as the New York Post writer tells us is "to cultivate open-mindedness and to secure the free play of the intellect upon all subjects." This is not the chief end of the activities of the pedagogues of Stanford and Berkeley who, like the Cleons of every age, invoke the ignorance of the multitude to stem the tide of controversy. An odious practice this, and one to which no self-respecting man should ever resort. The honest, educated man worships nothing but reason and justice, and he never looks for those qualities in what Edmund Burke termed "the swinish multitude." The agitators of Berkeley and Palo Alto, we regret to say, behave more like schoolmasters than members of a university faculty. Most of them afford a strong and pregnant contrast with a man of the character of Henry Morse Stephens, who is an educated man, one whose reputation for learning is world-wide. Holding himself aloof from the agitation that has kept this city in turbulence for two years, Professor Stephens has won the high tribute of the hostility of that pharisaical journal, the Bulletin. Being an educated man Professor Stephens is a man of experience; not merely of the experience that comes from contact with the world, but the more valuable experience acquired in the study of mankind. To educated men of the Stephens order of intellect experience stands as a divinity and clamors out, "Nay, let them speak although they know not what they say; there is wisdom even in the babble of children." There is nothing of the dogmatist or the fanatic about Stephens. Being an educated man he is not intolerant. He was trained in a university where men would be ashamed to frown upon discussion; where it was recognized as fundamental that men who believe themselves right never clamor for the support of might. All educated men know there is nothing more conducive to human knowledge and to the advancement of truth than free discussion. They are aware that even errors must be allowed room in which to express themselves. The educated man will tell you that one of the ideas essential to reverence for truth is faith in its capacity for self-defense. Do the so-called educators who have been trying to set this town by the ears believe in the truth of their cause? If so why don't they defend it like men? There are problems here that should be approached with candor, with solemnity, with patriotic purpose, with earnest scrutiny, without subterfuge and without reserve. Surely these problems are not to be solved by men whose pride has been stung, whose motives have been impugned, whose acts have been pronounced criminal, and consequently, whose blood is up. If they have no mistakes to be flattered, nothing to be screened from the public, then they should have no quarrel with the independent press. All power founded in wisdom and conducted with virtue, invites examination. It is the property of truth to court exposure, to solicit discussion. It is deception which in its baseness weakens the obligation of law by destroying its purity that would render its power omnipotent by controlling the press. Nowhere but under despotic and corrupt government has the press ever been looked on with alarm and terror; by none save those that recognize truth as their inexorable enemy. The so-called educated men of this bailiwick who would follow the example of the Inquisition by holding "opinion in chains of adamant" would justify themselves by the argument that they would proscribe only the corrupt press, by which they mean the newspapers that are not kept by the immaculate Spreckels or leased by the sacrosanct Phelan. This is not the argument of educated men who are conscious of the elementary laws of controversial warfare, and who would disdain the trick which the civilized world bars as illegitimate—the employment of personal abuse to excite prejudice against an opponent. Discussing this very same argument J. Sydney Taylor says that upon the same pretext "religion has been often abused to the detriment of morals, to destruction of charity and to the infliction of individual oppression and national calamity," and he adds, "We should never be afraid of the contention of free opinion because we know the truth will ultimately prevail. Those who dread discussion distrust their own cause; reason is not to be confused by alarm or subdued by force." Do the schoolmasters of Berkeley and Palo Alto who, knowing their text-books, pretend to speak from the height of accumulated learning,—do they dread discussion? If not let us raise the veil boldly, let those behind it face the light, and let the world know of the things that have been done in the name of justice, to purify an American city in the twentieth century.

Biggy's Tragic End

It was observed in Town Talk a few weeks ago that in these parlous times the people of San Francisco not only sup full on sensations but breakfast and dine on them also. It was by no means a light breakfast that we had the other morning when served with the startling news of the mysterious disappearance of Chief of Police Biggy, who is now believed to have gone to his death in the cold, dark waters of the bay. Whether his death was accidental, or, by reason of the cruel and malevolent persecution to which he was subjected, in the frenzy of a moment he was driven to suicide, is a question which perhaps will never be solved. It is useless to speculate on this subject, but surely the suggestion will not be taken amiss that the case is one which affords a broad field for the exercise of the imaginative faculty, a field in which it is possible to theorize with as much freedom as was taken by journalists devoid of intellectual honesty in discussing the suicide of that unfortunate wretch Morris Haas. The concrete facts however do not justify more than the statement that Biggy was the victim of cruel misrepresentation. It is believed that a sinister purpose animated the newspaper organs in which he was berated and maligned. It is known that under the cruel lash he suffered great mental agony, and that in seeking stimulation he greatly weakened his body reducing himself to such a condition that it must have been hazardous for him to venture on the bay on a dark night in a boat.

WILLIAM J. BIGGY

The most significant information that has been disclosed in connection with the death of Biggy was given to the Examiner by Congressman Julius Kahn. "Chief of Police Biggy," said Kahn, "was about to tell all he knew of the events that have taken place in the last two years. He made an appointment with me on Monday afternoon and promised to relate the whole story. He spoke of being persecuted by two newspapers of this city and said that he was subjected to this annoyance because he had refused to do politics with their favorites." How unfortunate that Biggy did not live to tell the whole story!

Biggy's last words of any interest were with Commissioner Hugo Keil to whom, according to the Examiner, he complained of the attacks that were being made on him by the paper owned by the Spreckels family—the Call. With the nature of these attacks the public is familiar, but the public had no intimation of the things that were to be done to Biggy. From the Examiner of Wednesday, in its report of an interview with Keil, it appears that Biggy "was much concerned over reports that had come to him of schemes devised by his enemies whereby certain alleged misdeeds of his private life were to be published." Word was conveyed to him," says the interviewer, "that a certain newspaper was seeking to induce his wife to commence suit against him in order to form the basis of an expose of his private life. All these stories it is said were rehearsed by the worried Chief during the two hours conference with Commissioner Keil." So hideous a design as the one disclosed by the Examiner will startle many people.

The Chronicle of last Wednesday tells us that Keil made a formal statement to Mayor Taylor of what occurred on the occasion of Biggy's visit. Keil reported that the purpose of the visit was to hand in his resignation. The Call of the same day contained the following: "The real interest centred in the business which took Biggy across the bay to visit Commissioner Keil because of the light it might throw as to the Chief's state of mind and the matters which were occupying his attention. Keil's statement however is of the most meager character, covering only the physical details of the visit, making a reference to Biggy's worry over the public attitude toward him and remaining absolutely silent as to the real purpose of the trip." This is the paper which has been howling about newspaper misrepresentation.

It also appears from the Call that the Citizens' League of Justice "was about to file charges" against Biggy. In this connection it is instructive to ponder the words of Mayor Taylor: "I am glad of the opportunity to express my high regard for Chief Biggy as a public spirited official. He was almost fanatical in his devotion to duty, absolutely incorruptible—money could not touch him—and he was one of the most conscientious officials I have ever known." Mayor Taylor's opinion of Biggy was shared by many. In his time Biggy held many positions of trust in public life, and nobody ever questioned his honesty. Nor was his fitness in the position of Chief of Police questioned until he refused to permit interference with his functions in the Haas case.

Apparently the League of Justice was not as well acquainted with Chief Biggy as was Mayor Taylor; for otherwise, it is fair to presume, the League would not have aided the designs of the Call and Bulletin. If Chief Biggy was all that Mayor Taylor says that he was then the League of Justice should have been eager to keep him in his position and to discourage such cruel methods as were employed to drive him out in disgrace. The League of Justice is a very active body of men. It has many designs occupying its attention, one of which is to censor the press. Is that incredible too? The editor of Town Talk received a letter from the League of Justice this week requesting him to set a date for a conference with its Press Committee, the object being a discussion of a resolution into the adoption of which the mass-meeting called after the Heney shooting was suggestionized by perfervid orators who had told the people that the press was perverting public opinion. The resolution demands a fair and honest attitude of the press, a sentiment in which Town Talk heartily acquiesces. It is prepared to defend every statement that it has ever made, or in pursuance of its uniform policy, to retract publicly and conspiciously any of its statements which can be proved erroneous.

In the Cause of Science

Reviewing the Strange Case of James Jackson a Life Term Convict Who Accepted the Short End of the Briggs Alternative of a Long Life in the State Prison or a Brief One in a Hospital for Incurables.

By Democritus

Dr. Wallace A. Briggs, Vice-President of the California State Board of Health has suggested that the State laws be modified to allow scientists to experiment on condemned murderers sentenced to death or to life imprisonment, for the purpose of ascertaining whether Koch or Von Behring is right in his theory regarding the origin of tuberculosis—Kock maintaining that human tuberculosis is practically never, Von Behring that it is practically always of bovine origin.

As proposed by Dr. Briggs it shall be optional with the condemned murderer whether he shall submit to the scientific experiments or suffer himself to be hanged outright; or, in the case of one condemned to life imprisonment, whether he will take his chance of eventual pardon or receive as a reward for his services on behalf of science a reasonable commutation of his life term.

I take it as fully granted that any murderer condemned to death would eagerly accept the experimental alternative. I take it as also granted that the healthy, robust life termer would hesitate a long time before he consented to go into the vivisecting room of the scientific investigator. And there is another—an ethical—view of the matter which I wish to present in the form of an allegory, a hypothesis, or, if you will, a logical conclusion to a possible phase of Dr. Briggs' proposition.

James Jackson and John Johnson loved the same woman. Both men were high-spirited young fellows, and both were determined to win the woman. The rivalry became more bitter and acrimonious as time went on and the fair one persisted in refusing to declare her preference. Each suitor, as afterwards developed, made vague threats as to what would happen if the other was finally chosen as the bridegroom of the reluctant lady. One day it was announced in the gossip of the neighborhood that John Johnson had been accepted. That night about half past eight o'clock the policeman on the beat where the fiancee of John Johnson lived heard a cry for help followed by a pistol shot, and hurrying to the spot found James Jackson with a pistol in his hand standing over the body of John Johnson. The policeman first arrested Jackson and then ascertained that Johnson was quite dead. Then the citizens of the neighborhood gathered and the patrol wagon was called. The tragedy had occurred at the gate, almost on the doorstep of the woman for whom these two men had been striving.

At the trial it was proved that Jackson had on several occasions said that he would "fix" Johnson if he won the girl. The policeman testified that he caught Jackson red-handed immediately after the murder of Johnson. A dealer in guns identified the pistol as one he had sold to somebody whom he thought resembled Jackson; but he was not positive. The woman in the case testified that while Johnson was somewhat violent in his language concerning the suit of his rival, Jackson was much more so; oftentimes exhibiting an uncontrollable animosity for Johnson. That was one reason why she refrained from accepting Jackson as her affianced husband.

The defense was simple and straightforward. Jackson said he had gone on that night to the woman's house for the purpose of making a last appeal to her, not believing the story that she had engaged herself to Johnson. As he approached the house he heard the cry for help and the pistol shot that was also heard by the policeman. He was nearer to the scene of the tragedy and reached the dead man first. He had just picked up the pistol when the policeman arrived and arrested him.

This version by the defendant was wholly unexpected by those who listened. It had been settled in the minds of the general public that Jackson would plead self defense in some form. The jury, after deliberating twenty-four hours, gave the defendant the benefit of all the doubts in the case and returned a verdict of guilty, fixing the penalty at imprisonment for life. On the first ballot they had voted five for the death penalty and seven for life imprisonment. It was admitted by those of the jurymen who confided in the newspaper reporters, that if Jackson had pleaded self defense and testified that he had killed Johnson with his own pistol, they would have rendered a verdict of acquittal. It was argued in the jury room that the defendant and his attorneys were foolish people, and finally, the five jurymen who wanted to hang Jackson on the general proposition that the world is over populated with fools, yielded to the superior argument of the other seven to the effect that the death penalty was not prescribed in the penal code as one of the punishments to be inflicted on such persons.

One day about ten years after James Jackson had received his sentence the Warden of the State Prison announced to the "lifers" and "rope-enders" that the Legislature had enacted a law permitting them to accept commutation of their sentence to death by consumption if the medical gents could kill them by inoculation with the same facility that they killed their ordinary patients by other processes. It was pointed out to the favored bunch by the Warden, however, that acceptance of the tender mercies of the doctors was entirely optional in their case, whereas he, for instance, though a free agent, would be compelled to risk his life in any adventure with the knives, potions and diagnoses of an empirical science. The Warden's remarks were gratuitously humorous, for he was a man given to mad waggery on the gravest subjects. He had acquired the habit in frequent effort to lighten the gloom of doomed men with their feet on the lower rung of the fatal ladder. Otherwise he was a good citizen and a very capable official.

James Jackson had grown tired of the monotony of his life-long seclusion. The faces of those about him wearied him and the routine palled upon him. He had no complaint to make concerning the treatment to which he was subjected; the food was wholesome and he had gained thirty pounds in weight during the ten years that he had served in the prison; he was robust in every part of him, his appetite was excellent and he slept well o' nights. Mentally, however, he was not so well off; he wanted to get out and see the world once more before he died; it was a whim, perhaps, but these vain fancies are oftentimes the most persistent incentives to human action and the most powerful springs of human desire.

After due consideration of all the chances in the game James Jackson accepted the alternative thus offered. Some of those condemned to death rejected the proposal. Perhaps these lacked, in some degree, the true spirit of scientific inquiry. Jackson signed the statutory agreement in such cases made and provided. He delivered himself to the doctors on condition that if the consumption virus "took" on him he would receive an immediate pardon and that if it didn't his sentence should be commuted to ten years' imprisonment in addition to that already endured.

One year later James Jackson was a well-advanced consumptive. He was accordingly pardoned by the Governor on the recommendation of the doctors who had poisoned him. He was free—free at last! But he was doomed—doomed to perish! The doctors guessed that he would live about one year longer, as they had doped him liberally from cows that were moribund and from cows that had been dead forty-eight hours. Jackson was a "living triumph of science," soon to be a dead one. He was a human document corroborative of guinea pig testimony in favor of the Von Behring theory that human tuberculosis is "practically always of bovine origin." As he left the prison the Warden shook him heartily by the hand and "congratulated" him. It was an ambiguous farewelling, for, as I have said, the Warden of that prison was prone to crack the merry jest even in the raw ribs of Death. Dr. Briggs, who is not a humorist in scientific matters, also congratulated James Jackson: "My dear Jackson," he said: "you have every reason imaginable to be proud of yourself; you have contributed yourself, your body and your life itself, to the noblest cause in the world—the cause of suffering humanity; you have preferred scientific experimentation in the service of your fellow men, and you must feel that this service is some slight expiation of your offense; you ought to realize that it would have been cruel to deprive you of this last solace of your conscience." But James Jackson was not "solaced." He was not a humorist. "Thank you, doctor," he said; "I suppose it was all in the day's work —your work and mine; but to tell the truth, I wish that jury had ordered me hanged."

The next day it was proved that James Jackson did not kill John Johnson. He was killed by the brother of the woman that caused the trouble. It was a deathbed confession by a consumptive who had acquired the disease in the regular way. He had neglected to confess while he was in good health because he was hoping that his political influence would be sufficient to obtain a pardon for the innocent Jackson. He had no particular reason for killing John Johnson. He was merely "tired of seeing him round," and maddened by the prospect that as the husband of his sister John Johnson would wear upon his nerves perpetually. He was sorry for James Jackson, but he "congratulated" him on his release from prison and his eminence in the public estimation as a "living triumph of science." Some dying men are unconscious humorists. This consumptive murderer was sincere in his "congratulation" but the joke was on Jackson nevertheless.

William Marion Reedy's Opinion

(The following sentiments were printed under the caption, "What He Deserved," in the St. Louis Mirror, the most influential and ablest edited magazine of the Middle West. The article was signed by William Marion Reedy, the editor of the Mirror. Mr. Reedy enjoys the reputation of being one of the most conscientious and forceful of American journalists. A man of the highest literary attainments, a philosopher and critic, his judgment in all matters that he seeks to illumine with the light of his genius is respected by the thousands of his readers that have been made conscious by his writings of the qualities of his mind and heart. Perhaps it should be observed that so far as Mr. Reedy's judgment on the subject of the shooting is concerned, it is based on the concrete facts presented in despatches that were remarkable and exceptional for their fairness.)

That the country is glad Mr. Francis J. Heney, prosecutor of the San Francisco boodlers will recover from the wound inflicted upon him by the ex-convict Haas, who afterwards killed himself in prison, goes without saying. Heney was and is doing a great work of purification and doing it against innumerable obstacles put in his way by the greater part of the wealth and culture of the California metropolis. Respectability has rallied against him to prevent the punishment of the wealthy and influential givers of bribes, claiming that enough has been done in convicting the small-fry bribe-takers. Nevertheless, it seems from what we have read, that Mr. Heney might have challenged the venireman Haas as a juror without, in spite of that person's protest and plea, exposing him as an ex-convict. Haas had paid the penalty of his misdeeds. The account of the State against him was closed. The slate was clean. Haas had an undoubted right to ask that the old score be not brought up against him, that he be not pilloried before the community in which he was trying to live as uprightly as he could, even if he was a saloonkeeper. That he valued his standing, such as it was, his plea not to be exposed clearly demonstrated. It was proof of his possession of a feeling that anyone but a supra-sensationalist, though an efficient and earnest public servant, like Mr. Heney would have respected. It was wrong for Haas to shoot Mr. Heney, but it was wrong for Mr. Heney to expose Haas in spite of his appeal for silence, and drive him to desperation through reviving an old disgrace. There's too much of this thing of pursuing the ex-convict and dragging to light his old disgrace. It is a form of official activity most contemptibly cruel. The State has no right to persecute a man who has made atonement for his sins against it. It is all very well to sympathize with Mr. Heney's heroics, but what of the poor devil, Haas, who was wantomly humiliated by the prosecutor? He was hurt worse than he hurt Mr. Heney. We hope the incident will restrain the police in such of their energies as consist in finding ex-convicts leading decent lives and revealing the fact to employers, to neighbors and to the public. We hope that when Mr. Heney shall have recovered he will be chastened of heart and that he will not again ruthlessly disgrace a man who, whatever his past, has enough sense of self-respect to dread disgrace. And let us say right here that a man sensitive enough to be tortured into insanity by the revelation of a sin or sins fully and fairly atoned for, is not wholly of "well known infamous character" even if the President of the United States himself, "takes his pen in hand" to say so. Poor Haas was the more to be pitied victim of the San Francisco episode. Mr. Heney emerges from it only with a brighter halo, to the eyes of the thoughtless. To our thinking, putting ourselves in the place of Haas, a man trying to live down a bad past, Mr. Heney came pretty near to deserving what he got, especially as there is absolutely no evidence that Haas was anxious to get on the jury for the purpose of obstructing the course of justice.

The Two Inns

Translated from the French of Alphonse Daudet.

Returning from Nimes one sultry July day, I trudged along a scorching white road, with never a sign of shade or a breath of wind until I came to a group of white houses at what is called the relay of St. Vincent. On the outskirts of the little hamlet were two large inns staring at each other from opposite sides of the road.

There was something striking in the proximity of those two inns. On one side, a large new building, full of life and animation, all the doors thrown open, the diligence stopping in front, the steaming horses being unharnessed, the passengers drinking hastily on the road, in the short shadow of the walls; the courtyard crowded with mules and vehicles; carters lying under the sheds, awaiting the cool of the evening. Within, outcries, oaths, blows of fists on the tables, the clinking of glasses, the clicking of billiard-balls, the popping of corks, and above all that uproar, a jovial, ringing voice, singing so loud that the windows shook:

"Pretty little Margoton,
As soon as dawn was waking,
Took her silver pitcher,
And went off to the well."

The inn opposite, on the contrary, was silent and seemed deserted. Grass under the gateway, shutters broken, over the door a rusty twig of holly hanging like an old plume, the door-step strewn with stones from the road. It was all so poverty-stricken, so pitiful, that it seemed an act of charity to stop there and drink a glass.

On entering, I found a long room, deserted and dismal, which the dazzling light, entering through three curtainless windows, rendered even more dismal and deserted. A few rickety tables, on which stool broken glasses dull with dust, a dilapidated billiard-table, holding out its four pockets as if asking alms, a yellow couch, an old desk, slumbered there in an oppressive and unhealthy heat. And the flies! flies everywhere! I had never seen so many: on the ceiling, clinging to the windows, in the glasses, in swarms. When I opened the door, there was a buzzing, a humming of wings as if I were entering a hive.

At the end of the room, in a window-recess, there was a woman standing close to the window, busily occupied in looking out. I called her twice:

"Ho there! hostess!"

She turned slowly, and showed me the face of a poverty-stricken peasant woman, wrinkled and furrowed, earth-colored, framed by long lappets of rusty lace, such as the old women in our neighborhood wear. She was not an old woman, though; but much weeping had faded her completely.

"What do you want?" she asked, wiping her eyes.

"To sit down a moment and drink something."

She gazed at me in amazement, without moving from her place, as if she did not understand me.

"Isn't this an inn?"

The woman sighed.

"Yes, it is an inn, if you choose. But why don't you go opposite, like all the rest? It is much more lively."

"It is too lively for me. I prefer to stay here with you."

And without waiting for her reply, I seated myself at the table.

When she was quite sure that I was speaking seriously, the hostess began to go and come with a busy air, opening doors, moving bottles, wiping glasses, and disturbing the flies. It was clear that a guest to wait upon was an important event. At times the unhappy creature would stop and take her head in her hands, as if she despaired of ever accomplishing anything.

Then she went into the rear room; I heard her shaking great keys, fumbling with locks, looking into the bread-box, blowing, dusting, washing plates. From time to time a deep sigh, a sob ill stifled.

After a quarter of an hour of this business, I had before me a plate of raisins, an old loaf of Beaucaire bread, as hard as standstone, and a bottle of sour new wine.

"You are served," said the strange creature; and she turned back at once to her place at the window.

As I drank, I tried to make her talk.

"You don't often have people here, do you, my poor woman?"

"Oh, no! never any one, monsieur. When we were alone here, it was different; we had the relay, we provided hunt-dinners during the ducking-season, and carriages all the year round. But since our neighbors set up in business, we have lost everything. People prefer to go opposite. They consider it too dull here. It's a fact that the house isn't very pleasant. I am not good-looking, I have fever and ague, and my two little girls are dead. Over yonder, on the contrary, they are laughing all the time. It is a woman from Arles who keeps the inn, a handsome women with laces, and three bands of gold beads round her neck. The driver of the diligence, who is her lover, takes it to her place. And then she has a lot of hussies for chambermaids, so that she gets lots of custom! She has all the young men from Bezouces, Redessan, and Jonquieres. The carters go out of their way to pass her house. And I stay here all day without a soul, eating my heart out."

She said this in a distraught, indifferent tone, with her forehead still resting against the glass. There was evidently something which interested her at the inn opposite.

Suddenly, on the other side of the road, there was a great commotion. The diligence moved off through the dust. I heard the cracking of the whip, the postillion's bugle, and the girls who had run to the door calling out:

"Adiousias! adiousias!" And over it all the stentorian voice that I had heard before, beginning again, louder than ever:

"She took her silver pitcher,
And went off to the well;
From there she could not see
Three soldiers drawing near."

At that voice the hostess trembled in every limb, and, turning to me, she said in an undertone:

"Do you hear? That's my husband. Doesn't he sing well?"

I gazed at her in stupefaction.

"What? Your husband? Do you mean to say that he goes there too?"

Thereupon, with a heart-broken air, but with the utmost gentleness, she replied:

"What can you expect, monsieur? Men are made that way; they don't like to see people cry; and I cry all the time since my little girls died. And then this great barrack, where nobody ever comes, is so melancholy. And so, when he is bored too much, my poor Jose goes across the road to drink, and as he has a fine voice, the woman from Arles makes him sing. Hush! there he goes again."

And she stood there, as if in a trance, trembling, with her hand outstretched, and tears rolling down her cheeks, which made her look uglier than ever, to hear her Jose singing for the Woman from Arles:

"The first one said to her:
'Good day, my pretty dear!'"

Yi's Father Was a Pioneer

While in town Tong Sao Yi, diplomat, statesman, commissioner from Pekin to Washington, talked for publication on the generalities of international affairs. The interviewers failed to extract from the amiable visitor anything that from any viewpoint could be considered of "absorbing," or even more than trivial interest. The Chinese diplomat is never a fountain of political information. But Tong Shao Yi, if he had been interviewed with reference to matters of a personal nature, might have been induced to unfold a tale of rare human interest. For this exalted heathen in all probability experienced curious emotions as he came into this harbor, and doubtless upon him recollections crowded and raised in him the impulse to talk of other days when he occupied a humble station in life and entertained sentiments toward the American people far different from those by which he is now animated. Ton Shao Yi lived in this city many years ago. His father lived here in the days of the Kearny riots. Tong Shao Yi, Ambassador from Pekin, deputized to thank the American people for their kindness is the son of a man who was stoned in the streets of San Francisco in the days when public sentiment was expressed once a week on the sandlot in front of the City Hall. Tong Shao Yi's father worked in the mines of this State in the early fifties. With the gold that he took out of mountain streams he opened a store in Sacramento street between Kearny and Dupont and there established the Tung Yung Company. His fourth son Tong Shao Yi came to San Francisco at the age of twelve years and lived here until he was old enough to go to Harvard whither he was sent by the Chinese Government along with Owang King, who since became Chinese Consul in this city, and Lian Chaing who preceded Wu Ting Fang as the representative of his country at Washington. After finishing his education at Washington Tong Shao Yi was appointed consul to Chemulpo, Korea. He was afterwards appointed vice-president of the Board of Foreign Affairs under Prince Ching, and later he became Governor of Mukden. In all probability on his return to China he will be appointed President of the Board of Foreign Affairs, the most important post in the gift of the Government.

Why Did Metcalf Resign?

In the East, I am told, there is much speculation with regard to Secretary Metcalf's resignation from the Cabinet. While it has been attributed to ill health, it is said that he could have held his office nominally for three months longer. It is suspected that there is something sinister behind Mr. Metcalf's resignation and that the truth will be sprung somewhere in California. There have been rumors of Mr. Metcalf's contemplated withdrawal from the Cabinet for more than a year. In these columns fully a year ago it was reported that the Secretary of the Navy was considering a proposition to accept the presidency of a bank in this city, and I have since intimated that there was friction between him and certain other Washington officials. It will be remembered that I commented on the signficance of his failure to attend the Republican State Convention in Oakland and say a few words for his colleague Mr. Taft, on the occasion of the nomination of electors. Mr. Metcalf was not only in Oakland at the time but he was within a stone's throw of the hall in which the convention was held.

The Mystic Lure

Though Charles Dana Gibson spent but a short time in town on his recent visit he absorbed enough of the atmosphere to get a taste for more. Just before leaving he said he would return soon and do some sketching here as he had seen enough to convince him that it would be worth while. "For many years," he said to a friend, "I have been curious to know what the San Francisco spell consisted of, and though I haven't solved the problem I think I have experienced a touch of the witchery that holds men and that inspires them with a yearning for the atmosphere when far away." According to Mr. Gibson, though he has heard many persons extol the charms of this city, he never met a more enthusiastic boomer than the late Hermann Oelrichs. He related that one night in New York, in company with Oelrichs he attended a theatrical performance which was so bad that it bored them very much. Oelrichs expressed his feelings by falling into an attitude of repose, and closing his eyes with half of a wooden toothpick adjusted over each lid as though to bolt it down, he exclaimed in a tone loud enough to be heard by half the audience, "I'd rather be an iron lamppost in San Francisco than a brownstone mansion in New York."

A friend writes me from Manila that Major-General John F. Weston who is to relieve Brigadier F. A. General Weston's health has suffered from his long stay in the tropics and he is now a victim of recurrent malarial fever. Major-General William P. Duvall, assistant chief of staff will succeed to the command of the army of the Philippines. He will leave Washington for his new post sometime in February, and he will probably be succeeded as assistant chief of staff by Major-General Thomas H. War Within Six Years

In view of current discussion of our relations with Japan and the contradictory reports with reference to the real state of feeling in the Mikado's realm toward this country, of considerable importance is the information which I have received as to the opinion of the army on the subject. It is not a subject which army officers care to discuss for publication; nor is it one on which they would be interviewed, and therefore one of the best sources of information has been closed to the public. My information, however, as to the opinion prevailing in army circles comes from an army officer, one who has seen much of Japan and who witnessed the great demonstration made on the occasion of the visit of our battleship fleet. "The Japanese," says this officer, "would open hostilities tomorrow were they not in sore financial straits. This is the firm conviction of nearly every American army officer in the Orient. What Our Pacific Fleet Needs

The Pacific fleet has just completed a voyage of about 10,000 miles from this city to Samoa and back to Magdalena Bay, each armored cruiser towing a destroyer. This voyage was taken ostensibly for practice in towing destroyers, and now, I hear, naval officers are asking if the same information that has been acquired could not have been obtained as well and at infinitely less cost by an armored cruiser towing one destroyer from San Francisco to Bremerton as many times as necessary. Additional information, they suggest, could be obtained from any of the companies engaged in towing barges on the Atlantic Coast. The point is made that much time has been lost that might have been given to manoeuvring practically little of which has been done by the Pacific fleet for the last year. The officers of the fleet realize that the crying need of the navy is practice in manoeuvring in fleet formation. Fortunately notwithstanding the little encouragement received from the bureaucrats at Washington our navy has learned to hit the target, but if a fleet cannot be manoeuvred, perfect shooting against an enemy that can shoot only passably well, but whose fleet is even fairly well handled, will be wasted because it cannot be utilized. Of the Pacific fleet of eight cruisers it is said that it has never steamed in line ahead at a speed above twelve knots. On the recent Samoan trip it was impossible to steam above eleven knots or to manoeuvre at all with the destroyers in tow, so that at a time when the President was threatening war against an Asiatic Power a large part of the mailed fist was ponderously doing collier or towboat duty; and had this fleet gone into battle with its then and present lack of practice in manoeuvring it would have fought at an enormous disadvantage, for all first class navies except our own are keenly alive to the importance of manoeuvring and are drilling assiduously at it, and not wasting time and money in world cruises.

Absurdity of Long Cruises

Apropos of the proposed trip of the Pacific fleet to South America it is said that four hours a day are to be devoted to manoeuvres. But the probability is, it is said, that the manoeuvring will be done at twelve-knot speed. It can't be much more for the coal carried by the vessels will not permit them to go much faster and still reach port. But why these cruises to foreign ports? Why would it not be infinitely better to select a base, say Santa Barbara Channel or Magdalena Bay, go to sea for five days out of each week and manoeuvre all day and part of the night, and really manoeuvre, starting in at fifteen knots and working up to twenty- possibly twenty-two? The fleet that can manoeuvre as if chained together and at the highest speed is the fleet that will win future naval battles. What has the Navy Department done and what is it doing to make the best use of the high speed armored cruisers we have? Is a 5,000 mile cruise to South America doing it? Is there not a lot of humbug in these long foreign cruises? Is it a fact that the extensively and industriously given out reports from the Navy Department as to the wonderful training of the officers and men of the Atlantic fleet are treated with ridicule by the officers and men themselves? Some good has doubtless been accomplished, but does manoeuvring sixteen to nineteen knot battleships at eight knots and twenty-two knot armored cruisers at twelve knots really not do more harm than good?

Keep the Money at Home

Aside from the advantages to be derived by the navy from manoeuvring near a base, there is a commercial element which is of such importance to us that it might be well for Pacific Coast Statesmen to take cognizance thereof. It is estimated on reliable information, based on actual experience, that the Pacific fleet's next cruise will cost in coal for steaming alone $495,000, that the officers and men will spend in foreign ports in the four months absence $736,000, and that the expenditure for fresh provisions will be $288,000; in all a million and a half spent abroad in four months. The other side is the effect on the morale of the officers and men of the fleet by shutting them off from even a short stay in a home port for the best part of a year and sending them to the ends of civilization, where life is a burden and disease and dissipation march hand in hand. If there were some necessity for so exiling them, forcing an unnatural existence upon them, there could be no criticism; but the necessity for such cruises has long since gone by and has no place in a modern navy or fleet. They have been given up by all other naval Powers. The efficiency of a navy depends on concerted effort and action in manoeuvres

Ho! For the Million Mark

A Million Club is in process of organization in this city. The object of the club is to give San Francisco a population of a million between now and 1915. The purpose is patriotic and practical, and it ought to be easy of accomplishment—much can be done in six years notwithstanding that London has been 2000 years accumulating a population of 6,000,000 and that Rome was not built in a day. There are fifteen cities in the world with more than a million population each; San Francisco in the census of 1900 was placed 61st in the list of the largestest cities in the world and ninth among the cities of the United States. This relative position may have changed somewhat since the census of 1900, but there are no trustworthy figures on which to base an estimate, and there is no form of exaggeration so common as that which "populates" a city. Los Angeles is one of the horrible examples of this kind of lying. If, however, the Million Club succeeds in its public spirited effort San Francisco will, in 1915, rank 16 in the list of the world's largest cities and fourth in the list of the largest cities in the United States. Outside of the United States, on the American continents, only Buenos Ayres will exceed San Francisco in population.

Population by Annexation

The plan proposed by the Million Club is simple enough. It consists in a united effort on the part of all the citizens of San Francisco to induce people to live in San Francisco. This means that about 350,000 boosters are to make it their business to advertise San Francisco and to make it possible for a population of a million citizens to live comfortably within our corporate limits. The task that the members of the club have set for themselves would be easier if they could annex all the suburban cities; the population of Oakland, Berkeley, Alameda and their suburbs, and the population of San Mateo and part of Marin County, would add at least 250,000 to the present population of the city, giving Greater San Francisco an aggregate population of more than half a million to start with. It was by annexation, consolidation and absorption that London, New York, Chicago and other millionopolises became such. But although most of the leading citizens of the transbay suburbs are really citizens of the metropolis, they would probably reject the privilege of becoming citizens of the 16th largest city in the world. Their ambition just now does not crave anything more substantial than the proud distinction of being a little bigger than Los Angeles and only a little less populous than San Francisco.

In Unity is Our Only Hope

So the Million Club will probably have to depend almost wholly on its own unaided effort. Here again the only difficulty to be suggested is a possible inability to keep the citizens of San Francisco "united." San Francisco is now more than half a century old and it has never been "united" on anything. There is a local apothegm which says that "where two or three boosters are gathered for the good of the town, there will you find five hard knockers with their little hammers." Recent history records the Lincoln-Roosevelt League, the Good Government League and the Citizens' League of Justice as authors of formularies of unity in the cause of morality, progress, reform, civic decency, rehabilitation, municipal beautification, official beatitude, honesty, virtue, square dealing, and many other good intentions which would have converted a Gomorrah into a New Jerusalem if only the unity plan could have been made to work according to the desire of the reformers manipulating the crank of the regenerator. But somehow it got abroad in the community that these organizations were the offspring of self interests, and this suspicion (baseless as the fabric of a dream, of course) created distrust among those who were not members of the Holy Synods. And the more these apparatuses of regeneration and reform strove to unify the sentiment of the community the wider grew the breaches until now the crevasses are impassible even for airships. It has even been charged that these "reform movements" have had a pernicious effect upon the business interests of the city and that our credit abroad is as one whose fair name has been blown upon by rude gusts of foul slander. In the matter of increasing the population of San Francisco to a million, however, there should be no difference of opinion, no distrust, no selfish interest, no personal politics, no hatred of our neighbor because he doesn't think as we do, no backbiting, no false accusation, no detraction, no hint from the labor unions that increased population means competition and low wages, no tirades against the "predatory rich" and the "associated villainies," no denunciation, no parochialism, no hysteria, no knocking. Everything ought to go along smoothly in the Million Club—a long pull, a strong pull and a pull all together; one prolonged boost instead of a swift slide on the toboggan; for lo, it is hard to boost, but it is easy to slide. I hope the Million Club will get there. Much power to all its arms. But let it not depart from its purpose; let it be always remembered that it is the object of the organization—the only object—to populate and not to decimate.

An Hawaiian Captain of Industry

My Honolulu correspondent writes: "The Planters Association at its meeting last week elected Hon. Samuel M. Damon president for the coming year. Mr. Damon has borne an important and a somewhat unique relation to the sugar industry of the islands for a great many years. He is at the head of Bishop & Company, a banking institution which celebrated its golden jubilee a few weeks ago. It was established by Charles R. Bishop now of San Francisco. Mr. Damon entered the service of the bank a good many years ago, later becoming a partner, and for twenty years or more he has been the head of the institution. Until eleven years ago this was the only banking institution in the islands and as such financed the developing sugar industry of Hawaii over many a rocky road. Mr. Damon himself never had very extensive plantation interests until the collapse of the sugar boom ten years ago when the Olaa plantation was thrown into his hands with all its load of debt. Under his careful management the property steadily improved and now it bids fair to become one of the very large sugar estates of the islands. The past year has been the best year in the history of the sugar industry of the islands. The crop is the largest ever harvested and prices have been on a high plane throughout the year."

Sam Parker Gets an Annuity

"The publication of the will of the late Mrs. Abigail K. Campbell Parker," writes my correspondent, "excited a good deal of interest in the islands. Mrs. Parker was the widow of the late millionaire sugar planter James Campbell who figured years ago in a sensational abduction in San Francisco. She was the mother of the Princess Kawananakoa, and some years ago she became the wife of that gay blade Col. Samuel Parker, who, in the days of his affluence achieved a reputation in San Francisco as a great spender. Mrs. Campbell Parker was an exceptional Hawaiian inasmuch as she possessed the acquisitive faculty. In addition to her first husband's estate she left property valued at nearly half a million dollars which she accumulated since his death. By her will she left $5,000 to her brother, $1,000 to Kawaiahao church, $5,000 to the Kapialani Maternity Home, an annuity of $240 to a faithful servant, and $3,000 a year to her husband, so devised that it cannot be attached by creditors, her object being as she states to provide for his support during his life. Her jewelry she divided up among her five daughters, including her little granddaughter Abigail Kapiolani, the daughter of the Princess Kawananakoa whom she adopted as her own a year or so ago. The remainder of her estate she bequeathed in trust to her children and grandchildren. The estate is to be kept intact until the death of the last surviving daughter when it is to be distributed among her grandchildren. In the meanwhile the net income is to be divided into five equal portions, and one portion paid to each of the four daughters, the Princess Kawananakoa, Muriel, Beatrice and little Abigail Kapiolani, and the other portion to the children of her daughter Alice—Mrs. Walter Macfarlane.

Gentleman (to hod carrier)—Doesn't it make you tired, Pat, to climb that ladder all day?

Pat—Yes, sir; but I have foine rest comin' down.

Not Very Far Off

A New York paper has been taking to task for attributing all our troubles to labor union domination. While owing to misrepresentation the New York press has a most imperfect conception of conditions in this city, the paper that has been charged with inaccuracy, as a matter of fact, has hit pretty near the truth. Not by reason of their influence or of their aggressions in industrial affairs have the labor unions given impetus to our troubles, but entirely in consequence of the designs which they have inspired in others, who have made use of them for political purposes. Many things that have been done ostensibly in the interest of the community were done for the purpose of coddling organized labor. And organized labor is today one of the principal elements of strength in the political machine by which this city government is controlled. A mighty powerful machine it is too; the most powerful, perhaps, that ever dominated San Francisco. It controls the machinery of the Democratic party and of the the Labor party and it has the support of an organized element of the disgruntled in the Republican party. This powerful political machine is the outcome of the great moral movement by which the city government was purged and purified. It is probably a most desirable blessing, but the concentration of so much power in the hands of a few men is hardly consistent with democratic principles, nor has there ever been an instance of which I am cognizant of human nature proving itself capable of exercising so much power without yielding to sinister persuasions.

MERELY A SHAM "MERRY WIDOW"

Looks like the real thing, but it's only a clever young clubman in the costume which he wore at a little entertainment given at the Bohemian Club not long ago.

At the Public Crib

So far this machine has vindicated its devotion to the interests of the people by harassing one or two public service corporations, and strengthening its hold on union labor politics. As late as last week the machine rewarded a distinguished labor agitator, the Hon. J. W. Sweeney, for services rendered in the recent campaign. He was appointed Secretary of the Playground Commission. The Board of Public Works is dominated by labor leaders, there is a professional laborite on the Election Commission, and that vociferous agitator, the Hon. Richard Cornelius, the man that precipitated the memorable railroad strike, which, according to a committee of organized labor was unjust and should never have been declared, still holds his job as a member of the Civil Service Commission. The union wage-earner, it is true, had no hand in the making of our troubles, but who knows how different things might have been had it never been considered advisable to appeal to his passions and his prejudices.

China Reawakened

The New Contributor is at work; he has taken his pen in hand and put the shoulder of his mighty intellect to the wheel of his first Idea. Roosevelt is enlightening the world. We must not expect too much from the New Contributor in his first article, and we don't get it. His subject is "The Awakening of China," published in the December number of the Outlook, and his first sentence as telegraphed in the "special dispatches" is "China is Awakening." There is a combination for a starter that would procure the rejection of any other manuscript short shrift and without benefit of syntax or saving grace of etymology. "The Awakening of China!" "China is Awakening!" Well, what of it? We've heard all about it, Mr. Roosevelt, and so often that we're sick and tired of the damnable iteration. China has been "awakening" for at least thirty years—stretching her skinny arms, yawning from ear to ear, winking and blinking her oblique eyes, looking at the clock, and plumping over on the other side for another nap before the dawn of civilization shall roseate the morning mists of the Far East. We certainly expected something more original than "the awakening of China" from Contributor Roosevelt in his "maiden effort." Why didn't he tell us that China was awake? Perhaps he thinks we don't believe the other contributors who have awakened China. Perhaps he thinks that only he can speak ex cathedra on this subject; or it may be that he has only just found it out. I begin to fear that I am near to the commission of lese majesty, or sacrilege, or misprision of heresy, or something worse. A vague apprehension creeps upon me warning me that I go too far in my ribald remarks concerning this matter. The awakening of China has certainly been announced before, but it has never been announced by Contributor Roosevelt until this writing. Africa was discovered and explored a long time ago, but it will not be really discovered or properly explored until Scientist Roosevelt shoots through it. There have been Presidents of the United States before Roosevelt, as there were heroes before Agamemnon, and there will be Presidents after Roosevelt; but, in truth there has never been but one President; it was ncessary to call the others by some title, and we couldn't call them anything else; but fortunately a Roosevelt duplicate was impossible—where Roosevelt McGregor, or McGregor Roosevelt sits is the head of the table! I am indeed guilty of felonious innuendo, treasonably felonious, in suggesting that China was awakening before Contributor Roosevelt informed us of the fact. It was a false alarm. It didn't happen until Contributor Roosevelt officially announced it in the Outlook. Now may the Lord have mercy on me for a short and ugly sinner and a citizen of the undesirable class. I deserve to be beaten to a frazzle.

A Master of Platitudes

Contributor Roosevelt has earned his privilege of writing platitudes at a dollar a line. If he had begun his "literary career" by writing platitudes he would have ended by writing editorials for the Red Dog Clarion or the Podunk Palladium. If he had not been strenuous in his youth along other lines than those required to make him a "valued contributor" to a ten-cent magazine, he would never have been worth even a penny a line to a "popular periodical"; Laura Jean Libbey and Ella Wheeler Wilcox would have had him entirely frazzled. He would have been telling us in the "leading journal" of Red Dog or in the Palladial Podunkian as he now tells us in the Outlook, that in China "there is increasing contact with foreigners, increasing foreign trade and a growing adoption of modern methods of communication and transportation, while some progress is being made in the introduction of labor-saving devices, with consequent industrial evolution." His editorial Alexandrines would end his song, and, "like a wounded snake, drag its slow length along"; or, as "when Ajax strives some rock's vast weight to throw," his line too would labor "and the words move slow." But the future associate editor of the Outlook was wiser than that. He first made himself something entirely foreign to an editor or even a "valued contributor." He prepared himself for his ultimate destiny by advertising himself in politics and through rapidly widening phases of that career finally reached the top of the heap. Thus prepared for his real work he has not the slightest difficulty in procuring acceptance for anything he may write, however banal or turgid or platitudinous. All of the "best sellers" in modern popular literature, except Bertha M. Clay and Miss Libbey, have been "rejected" frequently because they had not fortified themselves with a reputation or notoriety commercially valuable to the magazines. Kipling was rejected in this city by the Sunday editor of the Examiner because he was unknown; Jack London boasts that he sold a barrel full of rejected manuscripts to the publishers who had rejected them; Archibald Clavering Gunter offered his "Mr. Barnes of New York" to every publisher in New York and was at last compelled to publish it at his own expense—because the publishers didn't know that Gunter had written the best seller in American literature. The list could be extended indefinitely. Mrs. Wilcox, nee Wheeler, is excluded because she fluked into literature with her "Poems of Passion," an erotic immorality that achieved fame for the gifted authoress almost before she was in long skirts—a fame largely due to denunciation by decent people. Contributor Roosevelt has gone about it in the right way. He made himself famous before he became a contributor. As in the case of Kipling, London, Gunter and Wilcox, it is not necessary that he should write anything worth while; his name is sufficient to carry the weight of his platitudes and his commonplaces—his sermons from copy-book texts and his ponderous philosophy rehashed from the hoary wisdom of the ages.

THE WEEK'S FINANCIAL OUTLOOK

By R. E. Mulcahy

Wall Street security values continue on the upward grade, the advance during the past week has been seen in spots. Pacific Mail was taken hold of by prominent traders who believe a subsidy bill will be passed by Congress this winter, which seems more than likely; unless something is done in this direction soon Japan will have the Pacific Ocean to itself so far as shipping is concerned.

One of the strongest features of the stock market recently has been Consolidated Gas which continues to advance without any material setback. It has been well know that the assets of Consolidated Gas were equal to a value of $200 per share for the stock, nevertheless, this fact was lost sight of during the panic when the price dropped to around par.

The Industrial list has been given a great deal of attention of late and prices for these securities show an advancing tendency. Reports from large manufacturing centers show an increasing demand for labor of all kinds. It is quite noticeable in the steel trade, and is a barometer of more than passing moment.

The early convening of Congress will be used as a check to bull enthusiasm, but if present conditions continue it will take more than a tariff scare to keep prices from going higher; there may be some readjustment in this particular way but nothing radical will be done. It is no time to experiment with new ideas or fads.

We hear a great deal of grumbling regarding a small advance in freight rates, this comes mostly from consumers of paper; one has only to take up a foreign rate sheet, either passenger or freight, and compare it with the American rates to learn how much greater are freight and passenger charges abroad. In this country 150 pounds of baggage is allowed each passenger. Where abroad is such a privilege granted? It might as well be understood first as last that American railroads must live and be able financially to give the public quick dispatch for their goods and travelers. A readjustment of tariffs is at hand and in the long run the public will be benefitted. The amount of money necessary to bring almost every rail line in this country up to public requirements will be enormous; therefore, there is considerable justice in the rate position taken by railways. We are rapidly nearing the end of the year when three hundred million dollars will be distributed to go into commercial use; this will result in greater expansion of our commercial resources and cause cheaper money. Everything is going along very nicely and will continue to do so unless something unforeseen comes out of a clear sky. The prosperity now being enjoyed by the East will work its way westward soon. It generally requires six months to catch the fever along the Pacific Coast. The time is not more than five years away when San Francisco will have a population of one million people. The croakers couldn't stop it if they tried. No one realizes how rapidly our city is growing. San Francisco is the only city in America which is behind its country territory. Its natural advantages are so great that it cannot be kept down. Eastern capital will soon find its way here in abundance. Therefore many local securities around present prices are cheap and afford as good security as many of those of eastern properties. The demand for Western Pacific bonds and stocks has been very brisk of late. There has been a good demand for the common stock which would sell for $50 per share if any could be found for sale. It is a reasonable guess to say that Western Pacific common stock will sell at 100 within three years. The Western Pacific will have about 18,000 miles of tributary territory from which to draw business. It passes through a territory made for it, the business is awaiting its command; few railways are so fortunate.

We are in a period of development, from this time forward the changes that will take place will surprise the most sanguine as well as a lot of the old dry bones who are living in the past. The rich plums will come to those who have the courage to progress.

Denied the Brand

Reports are coming in of the turning down of members of the fashionable herd by the patronesses of the Colonial dances and of heartburnings that have been inflicted by the cruel edict of exclusion. Several young men who had been flattering themselves that there was nothing too exclusive for them have not been invited to the first of the dances, and they are so sore that they have been telling their troubles to their friends. I haven't much sympathy for the young men who take social preferment so seriously, but my emotions have been stirred by the news that two of the season's debutantes have been barred. The supposition is that they were voted against for no reason save that some of the patronesses didn't happen to know them. Up to the issuance of the Colonial invitations they were invited everywhere, and it seems rather cruel for them to be made conspicuous by being discriminated against in this manner. This is a cruel world and a large percentage of the cruelty of it is concentrated in fashionable society. I heard the other day of a social leader who invited a debutante to a dance, but sent no invitation to her mother. The latter wrote to him saying that she supposed it was through an oversight that he had failed to send her an invitation; that of course he knew her daughter had to have a chaperone. He replied that it was not an oversight; that the daughter was invited on account of her friends, but as her mother was not of his set of course he would not invite her.

A Bachelor's Reported Engagement

That loquacious dame, myriad tongued Rumor, is now hinting that another representative of the Tobin clan is on the point of yielding to the persuasions of Cupid. I refer to Richard Tobin, brother of Joe Tobin and Agnes Tobin and Mrs. Charley Clark. Long regarded as an incorrigible bachelor, of late he has shown symptoms of repentance, and now it is said that one of the season's buds is the object of his sentimental concern. "Dick" Tobin is one of the brainiest of the brainy Tobin family. He is a man of culture and has seen much of the world. He has just returned from a cruise in the Mediterranean on which he and his sister Mrs. Clark were the guests of Lord Lonsdale. He owns a beautiful home in San Mateo overlooking the new polo field at El Cerrito.

May Wed a Newport Belle

The report comes from New York of the probability of the early announcement of the engagement of Mr. Louis Bruguiere, brother of Pedar, Francis and Emile Bruguiere. His rumored financee is Miss Laura Swan a representative of the innermost circle of Newport society, a young woman of pedigree but no fortune and the chum of Cathleen Vanderbilt. Louis Bruguiere lives in Newport with his mother where they have a cottage known as Coddington Cove. He is now in Europe and Miss Swan is soon to sail to spend the winter on the other side.

De Young-Cameron Wedding

It was fitting that the wedding of Miss Helen de Young and George Cameron should have been elaborate with elegance, good taste and the refinement that marks and emphasizes long established social position. The bride has won the hearts of her friends and intimates by the womanliness of her nature constantly expressed in her action and demeanor, her innate kindliness, and her instinctive regard for all the amenities that make for sweetness and light within a wholesome and rational social environment. There were, consequently, more than the wedding party to rejoice at the happiness that has come into this young girl's life. The wedding was at noon of last Monday in the presence of about one hundred guests assembled in the spacious reception apartments of the de Young residence. It was in all its details a home wedding and therefore lacking in the expansive and striking features of a church ceremony. Thus it was inevitable that this affair should invite contrast with the church wedding of Constance de Young and Joseph Tobin, and of course there were differing opinions especially among those who are yet to be married, as to which of the two is preferable—the ceremony in which pomp and circumstance is dominant; or the less obtrusive, more genial and more familiar contact of intimate friends within the home environment. It is a question that will always be food for maidenly discussion enforced by argument that only those prospectively interested could urge because for them a wedding is the new beginning for all things—the real beginning. But in this instance there was no dissent of opinion concerning the appropriateness of the setting. The bride was lovelier than she has ever appeared, not only in the grace of her own presence but adorned with the exquisite creations of French art, so appealingly in every circumstance to the imagination of woman. And the charm of picture was enhanced by the ensemble of bridesmaids in their filmy gowns of chiffon. Phyllis de Young, and Dorothy Dean, cousin of the bride, led the bridal party as flower girls. The bridesmaids were Edith Simpson, Lucie King, Kathleen de Young and Alice Hager. Mrs. Tobin attended her sister as matron of honor. Wellington Gregg was best man, and the groomsmen were James Cameron, Charles de Young, Joseph Tobin, Walter Dillingham and Cyril Tobin. Archbishop Riordan officiated.

The congratulations bestowed upon the bridegroom were sincere in the knowledge of those who offered them that his prize in the lottery of marriage was substantial in every qualification of gentle, tender, loving kindness, in every gracious element that goes to the making of womanhood and wifehood. The wedding gifts were costly and some of them rarely precious. The bridegroom's gift was a dog collar of diamonds and pearls. Mr. and Mrs. de Young presented a chest of silver, duplicating that which they gave to their daughter Constance; and in addition they gave the young people a handsome Limousine. Others gave handsome pieces of jewelry. After the breakfast Mr. and Mrs. Cameron took their departure in their automobile for a tour of the southern part of the State.

They're Now of the Burlingame Set

The de Young girls are expected to revive the drooping spirits of Burlingame. That fashionable settlement has been suffering a long time from dry rot, and it is badly in need of the infusion of a little new blood. Life in Burlingame has become dull and insipid. Its affected air of exclusiveness has become something of a joke as nearly everybody realizes that it is no longer animated by anything but tradition. The old atmosphere has been dissipated, and ennui has settled upon the little enervated colony. The husbands of the de Young girls are of the Burlingame set, and the young couple are to live within a quarter of a block of each other in San Mateo. Mr. Cameron has taken the Kaufman house and the Tobins are to live in the Paxton Howard house which was formerly occupied by the Tom Driscolls.

Not In The Cards

One of the Burlingame cliques, I hear, does not approve of the capers that Dan Cupid has been cutting of late. He was expected to match a fair member of this clique with a young man to whom she would gladly have given her heart and hand, but the little god disappointed expectations by exciting the young man's passion for one in whom this particular Burlingame clique had not the slightest interest. But fortunately there are better fish in the sea than ever were caught, and patience is a virtue which the best of maidens must exercise.

To Wed a French Nobleman

The announcement of the engagement of Marie Christine de Guigne and Monsieur de Tampierre came as a delightful surpise to the many friends of the bridge-to-be on this coast. Monsieur de Tampierre comes of one of the finest French families belonging to the old nobility. As he is very well endowed with this world's riches, this may be considered a genuine love match on both sides. It was hoped Marie Christine would marry a Californian as most of her life was passed here and her formal social debut was made in this city about four years ago. Her father, Christion de Guigne, who by the way can boast of a title of his own, came hither from France when he was a very young man and it was here that he met and married Minnie Parrott, the eldest daughter of Mrs. Abby M. Parrott. His children have been to Europe many times, and they speak both French and German as perfectly as they do English. It was while in Paris acting as maid of honor to her cousin, Regine de Lalande, now Vicontesse Louis de Tristan, that Josephine de Guigne, the younger sister, met Philippe de Tristan, the best man at his brother's wedding. After only a ten day acquaintance their engagement was announced; and since her marriage to the young Viconte Josephine has spent half of the year in San Mateo and the remainder in Paris, where she has a beautiful apartment. Marie Christine de Guigne has made her home with the de Tristans ever since she met Monsieur de Tampierre. Unlike most of the American girls that married foreigners the de Guigne sisters made their own matches. Monsieur de Tampierre should be a very happy man as not only is his bride very accomplished, playing and singing exceptionally well, but she is of a very beautiful and unselfish character. She was a very devoted daughter to her invalid mother, whose death six years ago was a cause for general mourning. Mrs. de Guigne was one of the best loved women in California, and no higher tribute could be paid to her daughter than to say she has inherited her mother's qualities. Marie Christine is a cousin of Katherine Donohoe, who made her debut this season, and of the Parrott girls, who are still abroad. Her marriage will take place in January and like the Vicontesse de Tristan her time will afterwards be divided between Paris and San Mateo.

Two Questions

The retort courteous was given at the Sequoia Club not long ago on the occasion of a little reception. Addressing the most beautifully gowned woman of the evening, a lady wearing a heavily dotted vail said:

"Don't you think Mrs. B— that you are very elaborately dressed for this occasion?"

Said Mrs. B—: "Don't you think that on an occasion of this kind you ought to remove your vail?"

Bridge Prizes

The standard of taste in bridge prizes has reached a pretty high altitude in this city, and nowadays when a woman decides to give a bridge party she experiences no little anxiety in selecting her prizes. Rare works of art are of course the objects that usually engage attention, but it isn't every woman that knows a work of art when she sees one. The handsomest bridge prizes, I hear, that have been given since Mrs. Athearn Folger's baskets of lilies of the valley and jade necklaces and Mrs. Joe Chansellor's embroidered Mandarin coats, were the pairs of tall colonial candlesticks given by Mrs. Frank Deering at her last bridge luncheon.

The Polo Season at Blingum

The polo season in San Mateo and Burlingame has re-opened with fresh enthusiasm on the part of the local teams. Now that young Joe Tobin is a benedict and is making his home in San Mateo he will once more take an active interest in the sport, and Walter Dillingham of Honolulu is another polo expert who will take part in the coming matches. As it is we can boast of some excellent polo players. Tom Driscoll, Richard Tobin, and Cyril Tobin are among the cracks and as for Frank Carolan—well there is one thing that Frank can distinguish himself at and that's polo. George Cameron has just purchased eight polo ponies and he will try his luck this winter as will also Dr. W. McEnerney. The opening match on Thanksgiving day was to celebrate the opening of the new El Cerrito club house as well as the new polo field. It is on this field that all the big coming matches will take place, but Charles Clark and Frank Carolan have both offered their private fields for practice work. This series of games will bring society people Burlingameward over Sundays and winter week-end parties will again be the order of the day.

Miss Siegelman's Success

Miss Mabel Siegelman of Oakland, protege of Madame Gadski, and pupil of M. Louis Crepaux of this city, is attracting attention in Germany by her vocal ability. She has signed a contract for a two years' engagement at the Stadtheater of Stettin and has received much praise every time she has appeared on the stage. The critics say she has "a pleasing and well-schooled voice," and "graceful charm of manner," and that she exhibits exceptional knowledge of music.

Hill Pays $500,000 to Keep Sunlight in His Home

NEW YORK, Nov. 26.—James J. Hill, chairman of the board of directors of the Great Northern Railroad, has bought the four-story dwelling adjoining his residence here in East Sixty-fifth street. The consideration, it is said, was about $500,000. Hill made the purchase in order to forestall the erection of any structure near his residence which might cut off the sunlight.

Has It Come To This?

Has our society reached the deplorable state of complete subservience to Madame Nicotine? One of our most prominent matrons tells me that while she was searching for bridge prizes the other day in one of the leading jewelry stores she asked to see something suitable for both men and women, whereupon the obliging clerk brought forward an ash tray. She stared in astonishment for a second, but she could not repress a smile and while that is not the prize she selected she says she will keep it in mind for another occasion.

Because the Name Was New

Some girls when about to take the momentous plunge cultivate an acquaintance with the name they are about to acquire just to get accustomed to the sound, but evidently not so Gertrude Hyde-Smith. At a recent large luncheon, her first big post-nuptial function she made the tour of the table without discovering her name, and she called the attention of her hostess to what she supposed was an omission. On investigation it was learned that she had been looking for "Hyde-Smith" and took no notice of "Mrs. Baldwin Wood."

The Tale of a Sapphire

That beautiful sapphire ring which Miss Elizabeth Newhall wore at the dinner given by the Mayo Newhalls the night of the Donahoe ball was not at all of the significance which some of her shrewd friends believed. How they did gossip about that ring! What a prodigious amount of inspiration for the gossips there is in a sapphire when it appears on the finger of a charming girl. The fact is the dinner was in celebration of Miss Elizabeth's birthday and the ring was a present from her fond parents.

Debutantes Attend Junior "Prom" Dance

Mrs. Charles McIntosh Keeney and Mrs. J. C. Kirkpatrick chaperoned a party of the season's debutantes at the Hotel Carlton in Berkeley last Friday night, the young people having crossed the bay to attend the junior "prom" dance, which is one of the social events of the year in the university town. In the party were Miss Innes Keeney, Miss Dorothy Van Sicklan, Miss Newhall, Miss Kirkpatrick and Miss Marian Miller.

Engagement Announcement Expected

Rumor hath it that a very beautiful Stockton girl who spends a lot of time in town will soon announce her engagement to one of our most popular bachelors. The girl and her mother were recently entertained at luncheon at the Burlingame Country Club, and they have been the motifs of several dinner and theatre parties and motor excursions. In addition to these significant circumstances there is the fact that several young men are sighing at their inability ever to get a glance nowadays.

Among the notable sales of late from the Del Monte Art Gallery was that of C. Chapel Judson's beautiful picture, "The Oaks," which was purchased by Mr. Wm. Fries of San Francisco to place in his apartments at the Fairmont.

THE NEW YEAR'S CARNIVAL

By Tom Dillion (of the Finance Committee)

The motto of "One for all and all for one" is to be exemplified on New Year's Eve by the greatest and most spectacular celebration ever held on the Pacific Coast. The retail merchants, have, for the first time in my recollection, cast aside all petty jealousies and are working shoulder to shoulder to make the down town New Year's Eve celebration one to be pleasantly stored away in memory's casket for many years to come. The streets are to be illuminated by thousands of electric lights, each storekeeper will do his utmost in having his place of business decorated with evergreen and holly, flags and bunting and myriads of colored lights. Prizes are to be awarded for the best decorated stores and buildings and the finance committee have as yet to meet with the first refusal for subscriptions to carry this stupendous affair to a successful issue. The committee on autos have reported that there will be 1000 beautifully decorated machines in line for which special prizes will be awarded. The hotels and cafes have taken a great interest in the coming celebration and have contributed very generously to the fund. The Chinese merchants are spending a great deal of money in decorations and Grant avenue will be one blaze of light from Market street to Clay. The Chinese will put into the procession a monster dragon three hundred feet long, carried by two hundred Chinese; also a number of gorgeously attired celestials, all helping to make the closing of 1908, similar to the Mardi Gras celebrations held in New Orleans. San Francisco is celebrated the world over for the New Year festivities, and the committee in charge of the affair promises some innovations and great surprises even to the most skeptical. Visitors to San Francisco on New Year's Eve will see a celebration that will be most unique.

The J. R. Jackson's of New York have decided to make their home in California. For several years they have spent their winters here but this time they have come to stay. Mr. Jackson is negotiating for property in Burlingame, upon which he will erect a handsome home. Until the place is ready for occupancy, Mr. and Mrs. Jackson and their daughters will reside at the Victoria.

Rev. William Thomas Renison and his bridge returned from their wedding trip on Monday and are visiting Mrs. Renison's mother, Mrs. Foulkes on Spruce street. Mrs. Renison will remain in town indefinitely as her mother is very ill.

Mr. and Mrs. George Cadwalader spent the week end with Mr. and Mrs. Mountford Wilson in Burlingame.

At a tea last week Mrs. Thomas Morffew announced the engagement of her granddaughter, Miss Genevieve Peel and Grover Cleveland Elam. The wedding will take place next June

Miss Alma Birmingham, the talented daughter of Mrs. Lillian Birmingham, will make her debut as a professional pianist at Golden Gate Hall on December 18th.

Mrs. E. Walton Hedges is having a gay time in the East. She was a guest of honor at one of the dinners that preceded the dance and vaudeville show of the Columbia Yacht Club at the club quarters on the Hudson. She was also one of a merry box party at the opera the other night.

Mrs. Marguerite Hanford who left California several months ago is at present visiting relatives in Quebec. It is not unlikely she will go abroad before returning to California.

Mrs. Virginia Aldrich Beede who has been very ill for the past few weeks is now slowly convalescing. To Mrs. Beede belongs much of the credit for the successful vaudeville tea recently given at the St. Francis by the Albert Sidney Johnson Chapter.

The Tom C. Grants have closed their Napa place and are located for the winter at the Hotel Victoria.

Mrs. A. H. Voorhies who left California a few weeks ago for New Orleans will extend her visit abroad for a few months before returning to her home.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Stevens Kiersted, U. S. A., are among the latest and most welcome additions to the Army and Navy colony at the Fairmont.

The S. T. Piersons have closed their place at Saratoga and will be at the Victoria all winter.

Louis Josse and Pierre Germain of Paris who were out of town for ten days returned to their apartments at the Fairmont early in the week. These gentlemen expect to be in the city off and on during the winter.

Jos. D. Redding spent the week at Del Monte, putting most of his time on the golf links.

Mrs. W. H. Snedaker gave a very pretty luncheon in the red room of the Granada on Monday afternoon. The rest of the afternoon was spent playing bridge.

Mr. and Mrs. William Graham of Santa Barbara have come up to the city for the winter and have taken apartments at the Fairmont.

Templeton Crocker, who has been spending the early part of the winter at the St. Francis, leaves December 6th for New York, with his sister, Miss Jennie Crocker, and their grandmother, Mrs. Easton. Together with a number of guests they will make a pleasant journey in the Crocker private car, remaining in the East for the holidays.

Mrs. Drury Malone and Miss Ethel Melone who have been enjoying a visit abroad, have returned to California, are now at their handsome home "Oak Knoll" in Napa County where they will pass the winter.

Miss Elizabeth Ashe who has been visiting Mrs. John Kittle in Ross Valley has returned to the city.

Mrs. Carrie Green Noble has returned from abroad where she attended the wedding of her daughter, Mrs. Noble, her mother, Mrs Green, and Miss Florine Green will spend the winter with Mrs. George Maynard on Pacific avenue.

The picturesque home of Mrs. J. H. Sullivan at Belvedere has been locked up for the winter and the family is domiciled at the Hotel Victoria. The party includes Mrs. Sullivan, her two daughters, Elizabeth and Miss Sophie, and her sister, Mrs. A. L. Foye.

The Woman's Auxiliary of the Society of California Pioneers will give their annual breakfast at noon on December 5th at the Hotel Argonaut in the Pioneer Building. This will be the Auxiliary's first breakfast since the fire. It will be a brilliant affair. The decorations will be in yellow and green.

Quite a large proportion of the society folk of Burlingame make the Fairmont their home when in town. At times it seems like a regular Burlingame coterie. Among those who were seen at the Fairmont the past week were William H. Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. J. O. Tobin, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew L. Stone and their guests, Miss Havemeyer and Miss Vera Havemeyer of New York, Mr. and Mrs. Pringle, Mr. and Mrs. Percy Moore, and the A. R. Cottons.

Dr. and Mrs. Louis D. Mead of Byron Hot Springs have moved into town and will make their home for the present at the Colonial. They will doubtless be gladly received by the young married set. Mrs. Mead is of an old Southern family.

Arrangements are now complete for the vaudeville performance and reception to be given by the Daughters of the American Revolution in the White and Gold Room of the St. Francis on the afternoon of December 5th, and promises to be a delightful affair that will reveal most happily the carnival spirit of San Francisco's holiday season. With the most prominent society leaders of the city as patronesses, with an exceptionally clever program to be rendered by the best talent in the city, and with a most artistic scheme of costumes and decorations, a big success is easily forecast.

Disguised Herself as a Man

Paris is laughing at a story which has only just leaked out in connection with the recent performance of the Assyrian play "Sardanapalus" in the Berlin Royal Opera House. It is a story of costume; not at all connected with Assyria—the Kaiser saw to it that the habiliments were true to the period—but a male costume worn in the auditorium by Mme. Dieulafoy, the wife of the eminent professor of Assyriology of that name. Mme. Dieulafoy, herself a scholar of no mean attainments, accompanied her husband on various exploration trips on camels and horseback in the wild parts of Syria, Persia and Mesopotamia, when for the sake of convenience as well as for safety she adopted masculine garb, which since then she retained in private life. Among the learned assembly specially invited by the Emperor William to witness the performance of the new historic play were Professor and Mme. Dieulafoy, and here a difficulty arose, for even the costumes worn by women in the Berlin Opera House are subjected to a rigid set of rules and regulations and Mme. Dieulafoy refused to don skirts for the occasion. However, all went well and the professor's wife in male clothes played her part so naturally and well that no one except a few intimate friends suspected the disguise. The Kaiser heard of it afterward and laughingly complimented her on her success in impersonating a male part.

Daring Bank Swindle

No one but a daring humorist could have chosen to swindle a bank under the suggestive name of D. S. Windell, but the man was shrewd also, for he got no less than $13,000 from nine suburban branches of a big London joint stock bank by a beautifully simple method. Thirteen managers of branches of this bank received on the same morning recently an advice note apparently sent by the manager of a northern suburban branch notifying them of the transfer of an account of $3,750 standing to the credit of a client, D. S. Windell. The letter, a forgery, bore the secret code word of the bank and created no suspicion. Later in the day an affable, quietly dressed man wearing gold-rimmed spectacles drove in a taxicab to nine of the branches and at each drew $1,450 on the newly opened account. The fraud might have remained undiscovered for a few days longer but for the fact that one of the managers happened to write to his brother manager of the northern branch thanking him for sending on a customer. The letter, not being understood, led to inquiries which revealed the swindle. Less fortunate in the matter of plunder was another rogue who stole a heavy box of specie at Plymouth from the West African liner Sekondi. He had, however, omitted one precaution, that of making sure of the value of his haul, and he found himself in possession of a large case of small coins current among west coast negroes. A handful might be handy perhaps as card counters, but the rest are of no earthly use to anybody except among the blacks of the west coast of Africa.

Century Old Customs Discontinued

With the advancing years comes the passing of old customs, and in Waltham the early morning mill bell has outlived its usefulness and its ringing is discontinued after generations of use. For nearly a century the bell on the cotton mill of the Boston Manufacturing Company has been rung at 5 o'clock in the morning. In the early part of the century, even before General Banks became a bobbin boy, the 5 o'clock bell called the residents of the town from rest to labor. It was to give the housekeepers warning that the bell was rung at 5 o'clock, a warning that they would have just time to get breakfast and allow the employes to get to work at 6:30 o'clock. A second bell was rung at 5:45 o'clock as a warning to the employes to arise and prepare for the day's work. But as the town grew methods changed. The boarding house features fell into disuse, those who were employed in the mill moved to a more remote distance and the corporation houses passed into other hands. But the bell system remained unchanged. Its brazen tones fell on ears for which it was not intended. The reason given by the management for discontinuing the bell is that it is not necessary; that the system calling for its early ringing has passed away, and because mills in other cities have adopted the idea of less bell ringing.

Wanted To Be Remembered

The lawyer was drawing up Enpeck's will. "I hereby bequeath all my property to my wife," dictated Enpeck. "Got that down?" "Yes," answered the attorney. "On condition," continued Enpeck, "that she marries within a year." "But why that condition?" asked the man of law. "Because," answered the meek and lowly testator, "I want somebody to be sorry that I died."

THE MAN WHO RECITES

There's a man (Oh, I know it's not right,
But I'm longing to shoot him on sight!)
Who, when asked "Do you sing?"
Will reply, "Not a thing;
But I've got quite a lot to recite!"

He takes his stand on the hearthrug,
With a restless look in his eye,
As he settles his cut-throat collar
And adjusts his straggling tie.
He gasps with his mouth wide open,
Then stops with a sudden blush;
While the company eyes him coldly,
And somebody whispers "Hush!"

He faces the audience boldly,
With a resolute, stony stare,
As he first gives out the title,
With a bored and blase air.
It is probably Sims's "Lifeboat,"
(Where the sea gives back her dead!)
Or perhaps he will Clement Scott you
With "The Women of Mumbles Head!"

His voice has a throaty gurgle,
That will make your blood run cold,
And he works himself to a frenzy,
As his harrowing tale is told.
He waves his arms like a windmill,
And he shouts till his throat is dry,
The story of Texan "Lasca,"
And the death she dared to die.

On the feminine heads the hairpins
Stand up like the fretful quills
Of the porcupine; and the tear-drops shine
In their eyes; while curdling thrills
Run rippling down their backbones,
As he piles the agony up;
Or startles them all with the story
Of thoroughbred "Kissing Cup."

He may be a "Dickens" demon,
Whose tears are drawn from the well
Supplied by the younger Dombey,
Or he'll tell you how Sydney Carton
Went forth to be guillotined,
With a sickening thud! Till you long for the blood
Of the Recitation Fiend!

—Daisy.

"Paid in Full"

A Drama That Appeals to Reason Rather Than to Emotion and Exploits What Might Have Been Rather Than What Ought to Have Been.

By Charles Brant

A cad, a gentleman, a man and a woman are the ingredients of the melodramatic comedy "Paid in Full," over which the floating population of New York has been flowing in billowing audiences for a year. The cad is the husband of the woman, the gentleman is the rejected admirer of the woman still in love with her, and the man is rich enough and reckless enough to pay $16,000 to prove that the woman is as good as he thought she was. "Paid in Full" has been advertised as "a great play," with limitations as to time—it is the "greatest" written in fifteen years. Still, this is high self praise considering the circumstance that great plays are exceedingly scarce even in the critical comparisons of half a century. This play, which the audiences at the Van Ness Theatre have been applauding cordially during the past week, possesses many of the elements of a popular drama—a classification that does not necessarily include "greatness" however persistent its staying qualities may be in cities like New York and Chicago where it is easy to assemble a new audience every night year in and year out. The play is possible but not wholly plausible and only convincing in spots. It is possible that a man might risk his wife's honor to save his own or to keep himself out of the penitentiary; but such a man is exceptional and where he has been depicted in fiction, as in Balzac's Marneffe, he is a monster, absolutely abnormal and so steeped in the depravity of his foul nature that every sane mind pronounces the characterization impossible. As a vehicle for the playwright's premier climax, however, the character of Joe Brooks is excellent and necessary. It enables virtue to triumph over love, and that is a unique situation even in melodrama. It also enables Captain Williams, the rough, hard, half piratical capitalist to pay $16,000 as the price of a test of that virtue—all of which is possible, of course, but hardly plausible and by no means convincing.

The original excuse for the ultimate depravity of Joe Brooks is the circumstance that his salary as collector for the Latin-American Steamship Company is only $18 a week while his temptation is the constant possession of hundreds and occasionally thousands of dollars. This temptation is not only possible and plausible—it is the ordinary routine of every cashier of every bank in the world. The theft is also possible and plausible; but the selfish disposition of Brooks veiled under the false pretense of discontent because his wife is compelled to endure his domestic hardships consequent upon his inability to keep her in luxury, is an exaggeration for dramatic purposes, plainly apparent in the dramatic necessity of making Mrs. Brooks a cheerful, patiently-enduring and loyal wife, striving to put courage, hope and ambition into her husband's timorous, rebellious, impatient, fretful heart. Then it must not be omitted that the resentment of Brooks is largely justified by the meddling of a nagging mother-in-law and a sneering sister-in-law. This incentive to rebellion against the existing conditions added to the injustice of the small salary and large responsibility goes far to palliate the crime committed by Brooks. They are extenuating circumstances in an ethical problem even if they are not legal objections to the full penalty for the actual crime.

Another possible, but scarcely plausible situation in this play is the refusal of Brooks to receive aid from the friend of his wife. He rejects this aid ostensibly because he does not wish to receive "charity," but really because he knows that "Jimsy" is still in love with Mrs. Brooks. The complication would have been natural and logical if, in the further development it did not appear that this jealousy of his friend who is also the friend of his wife, is so inferior to the intensity of his selfish purpose that he is willing to "market" his wife to Captain Williams to accomplish the end that would have been honorably attained by accepting his friend's generous offer. This whole scheme is dramatic, but it is impossible.

The characters are well portrayed. The Captain Williams of Clarence Handyside is true to the reality as it exists anywhere "east of Suez." And the merit of the delineation both by the author and the actor is enhanced by painstaking fidelity to detail, in manner, action, expression and moral habit. Captain Williams is "true to life" as a type and as an individual. Albert Braum's handling of the character of James Smith the friend of Brooks and his wife is sympathetic and replete with the sort of humor that appeals to an American audience. William L. Gibson snarls through his delineation of the caddish and contemptible husband, with all the zeal necessary to carry an utterly thankless part. Miss Perry's rendition of the virtuous wife is commendable for its restraint under strong temptation to indulge gallery heroics in "the great scene" between herself and the Captain wherein her virtue triumphs over her love for her husband, as it should triumph, as we knew it would triumph, and in the final scene between herself and her husband wherein she "leaves him forever."

In the last analysis, however, "Paid in Full" is not really "a great play." It is a good play, a strong play, and it is well named. All the debts incurred during the action, and they are many, are "paid in full," including that which Captain Williams says he paid "to be decent."

James as "Peer Gynt"

Ibsen, the poet, Creig, the composer, James, the actor, are comprised in the "Peer Gynt" production with which theatre-goers are to be regaled at the Van Ness next week. Mr. James has a concert orchestra to perform not only the first and best known Grieg suite but also the second suite which Grieg wrote on Ibsen's invitation when "Peer Gynt" was first produced in Copenhagen. "Peer Gynt" is aptly described in the Balzac term, "A comedy of human life." James is said to do everything as Peer. He is at first youth, a bragging brawler, an amiable, beloved scamp; in his cups he sees visions of troll (fairy) land, to which he rides across the mountains on the back of a wild boar. In the later scenes he is the life-shriven old home wanderer. The ship on which he is sailing splits on a rock in the storm, and though others sink with the wreck, he is saved. Finally, after a career of extraordinary material success, and the gratification of every "pleasure," he finds real "happiness" in the arms of his boyhood sweetheart. The scenic side is embroidered in fourteen massive settings. The cast numbers thirty-seven, and the James' organization totals nearly eighty. There are three ballets, one whole scene being given to "Anitra's Dance" of the first Grieg "Peer Gynt" suite. There are two lyric numbers. It is the longest and most exacting role Mr. James has ever played, not even except "Hamlet."

"The First Born"

In response to numerous requests the Alcazar management has decided to revive "The First Born," the little drama of San Francisco's old Chinatown that ran seventeen weeks when it was first presented by Belasco & Mayer, eleven years ago. Since then the old world-famous Chinese quarter has forever passed away, but its sights, sounds and atmosphere are preserved in "The First Born." Survivors of the half-million people who witnessed the play's original production desire to see it again, and the newer generation of theatre-goers yearn to sit through a performance which they have heard so much in eulogy. Between these two elements the demand for the revival became so urgent that it could no longer be graciously ignored. Francis Powers wrote "The First Born" and David Belasco clothed it with the atmosphere that makes it such a wonderful reminder of old Chinatown's tinseled gorgeousness and dingy squalor. The story, briefly told, is of a bondwoman's vengenace. Chang Wang, father of little Chan Toy (The First Born), is a merchant who has been abandoned by his wife, Chan Lee. She is living in the house of a rival merchant, Man Low Yek. Seeing her little boy playing in the street, she decoys him into her home and hides him. But the kidnapping is witnessed by a pipe-bowl mender, Hop Kee, and Loey Tsing, a bondwoman, formerly the mistress of Chan Wang, who had cast her off before the superior attractions of the woman who subsequently deserted him and her offspring. Burning to be revenged on her rival, the bondwoman informs her former admirer of the whereabouts of his lost son. He rushes into the house, with a drawn knife in his hand, and in the scuffle which ensues the little boy is fatally injured and dies in his father's arms. In the second act, the disconsolate father revenges himself by assassinating Man Low Yek as the latter is leaving his house. Nothing could be more picturesque that the scenes in which the little tragedy is enacted. The first act takes place in a Chinatown street. In the foreground are two large and ornate dwellings, one on either side occupied respectfully by Chan Wang and Man Low Yek, the rivals. Between these structures hurries and strolls a motley throng of Chinatown denizens, while groups of them lounge about, talking volubly in their vernacular of the brightly-garbed women and children who pass, while various itinerant hawkers cry their wares, increasing the din created by the weird Chinese music that comes from unseen joss-houses and restaurants. As the development of "The First Born" consumes only about an hour, T. W. Robertson's three-act comedy drama, "David Garrick," will be used as a curtain-raiser. In this play Bertram Lytell, Evelyn Vaughan and the cream of the Alcazar company will be afforded opportunity to do some very impressive acting.

Arthur Hartmann's Farewell Concert

Next Sunday afternoon at Christian Science Hall, Arthur Hartmann the young Hungarian violinist and one of the most gifted geniuses that has ever appeared in San Francisco will bid farewell to our music lovers with a glorious feast of violin music. Artists like Hartmann are few and far between and his return will be eagerly awaited by our music lovers for we are very loyal to those we admire and Hartmann has certainly won a warm place in the hearts of our concert-goers. Although born in Hungaria Mr. Hartmann was raised in this country and is an American citizen. But he plays with all the fire and spirit of his native land which is famous for its violinists. Alfred Calzin who is the accompanist as well as soloist with Mr. Hartmann has likewise left a deep impression. For this farewell concert Mr. Hartmann will play the "Concerto in D minor" by Vieuxtemps, the "Chaconne" by Bach, by special request his own transcription of Claude DeBussy's song "Je pleur dans mon coeur," his transcription of MacDowell's "To a Wild Rose," "Farfalla" by Emil Sauret and a "Grand Fantasy" which he calls "In the South" by Mr. Hartmann. This last named is a transcription of favorite southern melodies which Hartmann characterizes as a bit of light nonsense. Mr. Calzin's numbers will include works by Chopin, Alberto, Jonas, MacDowell and Liszt. Seats may be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s and on Sunday after 10 a. m. at the hall, corner of Sacramento and Scott streets.

LAWRENCE H. STRAUSS

To appear at Century Hall, Tuesday evening, December 8th.

In Margaret Anglin's Role

It is doubtful if a "stock" actress ever before found herself in just the position Miss Blanche Stoddard, the new leading woman at the Valencia, will face next week in the title role of "Zira," the second offering of the winter season by the new Valencia stock company. For Miss Stoddard played through Margaret Anglin's long engagement in the famed emotional drama in the part of Ruth Wilding, the part which has long been held to be the strongest "second woman's" role ever written. And as the English gentlewoman who has been robbed of her name and individuality by the unhappy Hester Trent (Zira) Miss Stoddard strived bravely to force her personality beyond the footlights in a way that would bring home to the audience the relative value of the two parts. Beginning Monday evening Miss Stoddard will play the role she saw Miss Anglin play so many months and will experience the unique sensation of watching another ambitious actress, Miss Helen Lackaye, the Valencia's new second woman, playing opposite imbued with the same ambitions that formerly stirred her to do her best. Admittedly a revamped version of Wilkie Collins' celebrated novel, "The New Magdalen," the play "Zira" has fastened on the public's favor so infinitely more tenaciously as to make a comparison unnecessary. And in truth there is a decided difference in the book and the drama. For Zira has not sinned and Wilkie Collins' heroine did sin. Hester Trent, discovering the man she married in good faith has another wife living, seeks to bury herself and the past by becoming a nurse in the British army. The prologue of the play finds her in this capacity inside the British lines in South Africa during the Boer war. When Ruth Wilding, possessing all the joys of life denied to Hester, is struck and supposedly killed by a stray shell—it is rather the impulse of a moment (and not the deed of a wicked woman) that leads Hester to change her nurse's garb for the traveling dress of the English lady. And later, in England, when Hester finds herself successful in her impersonation of the real Ruth Wilding there seems indeed no evil done anyone in her continuing the masquerade which is bringing her not alone all the comforts of life but a lover whose regard is of the kind that stands testing. Miss Stoddard has proved so conclusively her ability as an emotional actress not only by her work in "Aristocracy" but by her long record of eminently gratifying realizations of leading roles, that Zira in her hands should prove as wonderfully a portrayed character as even the woman she played "opposite" in the original production made it.

The Nordica Concerts

Mme. Lillian Nordica who is making a transcontinental tour will appear in this city Sunday afternoons, December 13 and 20, at the Van Ness Theatre. Mme. Nordica has the honor of being one of the few foreign artists invited by Frau Wagner to participate in the great Wagnerian festivals at Bayreuth, and at the famous cycles in Munich no singer is as popular as our own Nordica. With Mme. Nordica will come Frederick Hastings, a talented baritone, Emma Showers, a piano virtuosa, and Andre Benoist, one of the finest accompanists in the world, who will be remembered here for his splendid work with Jean Gerardy just previous to the disaster. Although Mme. Nordica carries this company with her she sings no less than a dozen lyric and one great dramatic aria at each concert. For her first concert (Sunday the 13th) she has selected the big "Narrative and Curse" scene from the first act of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," "Seligkeit" by Frank Van der Stucken, "Mein Liebe ist Gruen," Brahms, "In Mitte des Balles," Tschaikowsky, "Cacellie," Strauss, "Vielle Chanson," Bizet, a specially made transcription of a Chopin "Nocturne," "Nell," Faure, "Mattinata," Leoncovallo, "Twilight," Walter Rummel, "Kashmiri Song," Amy Woodforde-Finden, "A Theme," Andre Benoist, "Spring Song," Hammond, and Schubert's "Der Erlkonig." Mr. Hastings will sing the "Aria" from "Marriage of Figaro," and songs by Hatton, Elgar and Strauss, and Miss Showers will play numbers by Grieg, Liszt and Chopin. Seats will be $2.50, $2.00, $1.50 and $1.00, and will be ready next Wednesday at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, where complete programs for all the concerts may be obtained.

Max Figman Coming

Max Figman comes to the American Theatre Sunday afternoon, December 6th, when he will present for the first time in this city his latest comedy success "The Substitute." Mr. Figman has established himself a firm favorite with the theatre-goers of this city through his admirable performance of "The Man on the Box." His art and earnestness are well known to the public and coupled with his remarkable versatality renders his appearance in a new play a matter of more than ordinary expectation and interest. According to all accounts "The Substitute" fits his temperament and personality fully as well as Harold MacGrath's hero did, and gives him more scope to show his ability as an actor of serious moment. Manager John Cort who directs his tour has provided him with an exceptionally strong supporting company and a production that is complete in every detail. The story of "The Substitute" relates the experiences of James Smith, a New York lawyer, who goes to a little country church in Connecticut to preach a sermon, and act as the substitute for his prospective brother-in-law, a young theologian, who had been engaged for the service, but was unable to fill it owing to having been prostrated by the heat while journeying to the town. Smith had promised to find a substitute in one of the New York seminaries, but failing was compelled to go himself. The ludicrous situation of a sporty New York lawyer posing as a country parson may be more readily imagined than described.

The Lawrence Strauss Tenor Recital

Lawrence H. Strauss, the young tenor who has just returned from several years study abroad and who is in addition to a singer a thorough musician and pianist will give his first recital next Tuesday night, December 8, at Century Hall, corner Sutter and Franklin streets. Mr. Strauss will present an exceptionally fine program of songs in Italian, French, German and English. He will open his program with "Venni Amore" by Fesch. This will be followed by a group of German works, including "Ruhe Sussliebchen" by Brahms, "Auf dem grunen Balken" by Hugo Wolff, Richard Strauss' "Traum durch die Dammerung" and "Lockruf" by Ruckauf. There will also be a group of especially attractive numbers in the French among which will be an aria from Massenet's "Manon," "Adieu" by Faure, and a group of old French songs of the 18th Century. There will be five of these delightful gems. Miss Dorothy Pasmore will play two cello numbers, "Tarantelle" by Popper and "Kol Nidre" by Max Bruch, and Miss Therese Ehrmann, an exceptionally clever pianiste, will be the accompanist. Seats may be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, the price being $1.00

The Dutch Comedians

Kolb and Dill have gathered fresh laurels in their new play, "Weiner and Schnitzel," which is every bit as funny a vehicle for their comic talent as "Playing the Ponies." From their first entrance till the fall of the final curtain they convulse their audiences with laughter, and judging from the enthusiasm displayed by crowded houses at every performance there is every indication that "Weiner and Schnitzel" will have a long and prosperous run. Every one should witness this delightfully humorous play. Those who are able to refrain from shrieks of laughter should immediately seek out a doctor as there must be something radically wrong with them.

Orpheum Vaudeville

A particularly captivating program will be presented at the Orpheum for the week beginning this Sunday matinee. A tabloid beauty show and musical comedy, entitled Gus Edwards' Blonde Typewriters and consisting of six handsome and dainty girls, who are the real thing in blondes and can truthfully exclaim Peroxide' Avaunt! I know thee not, will be the headliner. They excel as comediennes, singers and dancers. They are associated with Arthur Conrad, an excellent eccentric comedian and a remarkably agile dancer. Another novelty which is expected to create a tremendous hit is the witty and clever comedy "Motoring," which will introduce Harry Tate's original London company. It is a timely skit on the automobile craze and tells of the adventures of a typical British clubman who goes for a spin in his motor car with his half witted son Ronald, and a chauffeur, who assassinates the King's English and doesn't know the difference between a sprocket and a carburette. The Italian Trio, who hail from Naples, will make their first appearance here next week. The Majestic Trio, Towle, Smith & Towle, one of the best colored singing and dancing teams in vaudeville, will give the Orpheum audience a taste of their quality. These talented brunettes are always a hit and will emphasize the variety of the entertainment. Next week will be the last of Felice Morris & Co.; Linton & Laurence; Happy Jack Gardner and also of Castellane and Brother whose daring bicycle act with its double somersaults in midair is one of the greatest sensations that vaudeville has presented in a long while. A novelty in Motion Pictures will conclude a performance or rare merit and enjoyment.

Australian Critics Praise Margaret

Louis Nethersole, manager for Margaret Anglin, writes me as follows from Melbourne under date of October 25th: "The success that Margaret Anglin achieved in Sydney was more than equaled in Melbourne, where until the 29th instant, she is playing, completing then a ten weeks' season at Her Majesty's Theatre. Among the plays that she has presented here are Shakespeare's "The Taming of the Shrew" and "Twelfth Night" and she scored heavily in both comedies. Indeed the consensus of opinion among the critics is that Miss Anglin is by far the finest Shakespearian actress either England or America has ever sent to their shores. Miss Anglin having already extended her original agreement which was to play in Australia for four months, purposes to end her tour here at Christmas and then at once to sail for Egypt where she wishes to spend a few weeks with her sister and enjoy a well earned rest and vacation. She will not appear in America again until next September when she opens at the Hollis Street Theatre, Boston, in Mrs. Delande's dramatized story, "The Awakening of Helena Ritchie," which, you may recall, she has already successfully tried in Philadelphia last Spring."

In the Limelight

Manager Bishop will lay off his entire stock company at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, on Tuesday night, December 15, in order to give the music lovers of Alameda County an opportunity of hearing Mme. Nordica and as a personal accommodation to Will L. Greenbaum.

"Ben Hur" will be the immense attraction at the Van Ness Theatre in the latter part of the month. Klaw and Erlanger will stage the play on even a more elaborate scale than when it was first offered at the old Grand Opera House.

"The Lion and The Mouse" is announced for a return engagement at the Van Ness Theatre, opening there on Monday, December 14. The Charles Klein play holds its popularity this the fourth season of its existence.

Will Greenbaum announces a two weeks' season of Italian Grand Opera by the re-organized and increased Lambari Company for the middle of January. The company numbering 150 people will come here from Guatemala.

The final performance of "Paid in Full" will take place at the Van Ness Theatre on Sunday night. The Eugene Walter play has made really a great sensation.

E. H. Sothern as Lord Dundreay and a one week return engagement of "Brewster's Millions" are January attractions for the Van Ness Theatre.

After January 1st the box office for the Greenbaum attractions will be maintained at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s Sutter and Kearny streets store only.

Auto Notes

Fred Swanton, Manager of the Casino at Santa Cruz, and a prominent motorist of the Sea Beach resort, has purchased a six-cylinder 40 horsepower Thomas touring car. Swanton will take immediate delivery of his car, and expects to do a great deal of touring this winter.

Mr. Geo. H. Woodward, the local auto expert, won the prize this week for the fastest operation of the new Diamond Demountable rim, the second try resulting in the removing and applying in one minute and five seconds. He is enthusiastic over the new rim.

The first shipment of the new Cadillac "30" for San Francisco left Detroit, Michigan, on November 19th, and is expected here about the 10th of December. These cars will be delivered to Waterman Bros., Fresno, Salbach-Middlekauff Co., Stockton, Clarence Letcher, San Jose, Mr. J. W. Stetson, Oakland, and Weinstock-Lubin Co., of San Francisco.

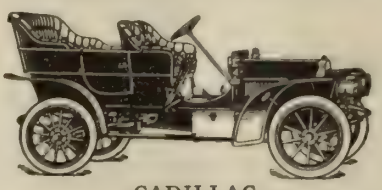
Howard Hickman of the Alcazar Stock Company purchased from the Howard Automobile Company a Buick "White Streak," which he finds much pleasure driving about the city between performances, matinees and rehearsals in company with his wife, who in public life is known as Bessie Barriscale, and is also a member of the Alcazar Stock Company.

A clean sweep in their respective classes was scored by the Chalmers-Detroit cars according to the following telegram received this week by the Pioneer Automobile Company: "Chalmers-Detroits win every event entered in Automobile Club of Maryland Hill Climb. Chalmers "30" wins $2000 and under class, time one min. 3 sec. Chalmers Forty wins $3000 and under class, time 50 seconds, hill six-tenth mile, very muddy, both cars carried full equipment. Zell Motor Car Co."

M. H. De Young of the San Francisco "Chronicle" is the latest to purchase the new Diamond Demountable rim, having placed an order for two sets for his cars this week.

Dr. L. R. Johnson of Angels Camp, Calaveras County, spent the week end seeing the sights in and about this city. He made the round trip in his Buick "White Streak."

What is probably the record for economy in the upkeep of a modern automobile is shown in the following letter from Charles Schock, who owns and drives a Chalmers-Detroit car at Montague, California: "Pioneer Automobile Company, San Francisco, Gentlemen:—Have run this car over a thousand miles and haven't paid out five cents for repairs. Drove over hills and through plowed ground where it seemed impossible for an automobile to go. Never even had a puncture in the Diamond tires. Yours truly, Charles Schock, Jr."



An unusual feature of the automobile business in this city, and one that has not been fully appreciated, is the great number of motor cars used in the rent service. There are probably over two hundred cars in the rent service. That the drivers of cars in the public service find it profitable is shown by the large number of expensive machines now in that business. No less than sixty-five Thomas Flyers are being used daily in the tourist and sight-seeing trade. Practically all of the owners of these cars have an investment of several thousand dollars in their car

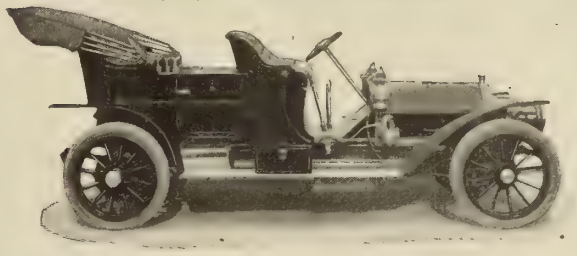
Safe Books for Children



For little girls just on the outer verge of absorption in fairy lore there is nothing better than Nina Rhoades' Brick House Books. The volumes are detached, and the little maid who misses one or two is not disturbed by a breaking of the sequence. Yet by mentioning the same characters now and then a pleasant sense of intimacy and long acquaintance is secured. It is the cover design, a red brick house, which gives the series its title. Miss Rhoades' little girls are always well-bred, whether they are rich or poor, and they are never little prigs, but healthy, hearty mortals who do the wrong things in perfect innocence and make mistakes, and are good and bad by turns but always safe companions. "Brave Little Peggy" of the present story might have been very lonely and unhappy if she had only known the way, for she was only ten and her father and mother were both dead. She had lived with her grandmother since she was four and now grandma too was dead. Peggy had a big sister and brother in New Jersey, and the little girl in Southern California never once suspected that Edith, who took six months to acknowledge her little sister's Christmas gift, and Harry who never acknowledged it at all, were not just as fond of her and just as anxious to see her as she was to meet them. When Aunt Mary seized the first opportunity to send Peggy East the little girl assumed that she was to stay always, and very much dismayed she was to overhear the beloved Edith telling one of her fashionable friends that Peggy was to be sent back to California in a few weeks. Edith, it must be confessed, was a selfish and thoughtless young lady, and the little sister, left alone both day and night, despite her efforts to avoid "being a bother" had some thrilling adventures. The tendency to make little girl heroines either abominable prigs and Pharisees or to go to the other extreme and create slangy, rude hoidens whose good hearts are presumed to counterbalance their bad conduct is so strong that the Brick House books are in a class by themselves for the younger readers, and parents who have not time or opportunity to examine minutely before purchase will be safe in "going by the label." Published by Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

Story of An American Kingdom

For a setting for the dramatic incidents of "The Courage of Captain Plum," James Oliver Curwood has chosen that little known episode of American history, the setting up of a monarchy with a veritable king on an island off the shore of Wisconsin, in Lake Michigan. James Jesse Strang was perhaps, the ablest of the followers of Joseph Smith, the founder of Mormonism. After the Smith brothers had been executed by the Nauvoo mob Strang, who was then in Vermont, produced a letter which he claimed to have received nine days previous to the tragedy, in which Smith related to him at length a divine revelation of his own death and a command to name Strang as his successor. The Mormon leaders refused to accept the communication as genuine, and Strang withdrew, taking with him an appreciable following. He at once proceeded to discover metallic plates covered with strange characters unintelligible to any one but himself and to receive communications from on high, among them one to proceed to Wisconsin and eventually to Beaver Island, there to "plant a stake in Zion," which orders he carried out to the disgust of the fishermen and farmers already settled there. He adopted the title of King and set up a well equipped printing plant from which he issued his various manifestoes and books "printed by command of the king." In 1851 the U. S. steamer Michigan was sent to break up the colony, it being believed that the Mormons were trespassers on the public domain. Strang and some others were taken to Detroit for trial and were acquitted. Mr. Curwood has not adhered closely to historical accuracy. The dissension which wrecked Strang's kingdom came partly from the jealousy of some of his leading disciples and partly from the revolt against the severity of his sumptuary laws and strict enforcement of punishments. The uprising of the coast fishermen did not occur until after the death of Strang. They fell upon the colony and evicted the Mormons. The faithful were given but one day of grace. Ax and torch were freely applied to homestead and crops and the exiles who were turned adrift were in as pitiable a plight as the Acadians of "Evangeline." Mr. Curwood has made free use of only the closing scenes. Captain Plum, a young lake sailor, having been made a victim of the Mormon pirates, determined to revenge himself on them, and returned with his vessel well armed and prepared. He landed on the island and fell into the hands of an old, half-crazed elder of the church. Plum, young and impressionable, fell in love with a beautiful young girl, one of Strang's victims. He also made practical objection to the carrying out of Strang's law, and found himself, in consequence, imprisoned and condemned to a horrible death. Just in the nick of time to prevent the annihilation of two pair of fond lovers, Mr. Curwood sent the Michigan into the harbor of St. James to bombard the town, wipe out the nest of traitors and bring the reign of King Strang to an end. There is enough real history in "The Courage of Captain Plum" to save it from being all fiction, while the tangled threads of the double love story, and the long-nursed enmity of Obediah Price furnish the romantic interest. From Bobbs-Merrill.

. . . . THE . . . .

$200 VICTROLA

The Talking Machine Without a Horn

Here is the most wonderful musical instrument in the world. It is a $200 Talking Machine, called the Victrola.

The top closes down over the record and shuts out all mechanical sounds.

The music is forced through a mahogany sound reflector.

Two little doors at the mouth of the sound reflector may be opened and adjusted to regulate the volume to suit the room.

In appearance it resembles a music cabinet, which it is, for the base is arranged to provide storage room for scores of records.

The Victrola is the perfected Victor.

The De Luxe edition—the best that money can buy.

It occupies in the world of Talking Machines the same position the Steinway occupies in the world of pianos.

It is the premier instrument—the standard by which all other talking machines are measured.

The Victrola can be played loud enough to fill a ballroom with the strains of a waltz, or soft enough for a sickroom—the regulation is perfect.

It is the Victor idealized—the talking machine of the future—the one perfect instrument.

It is ornamental and will do credit to the most princely surroundings. Already it is beginning to constitute an indispensable part of the furnishings of some of America's most exclusive homes.

You will be proud to own a Victrola. It will be the same pride that goes with the ownership of the best automobile, the best yacht, the best piano or the best painting.

There is nothing that gives such eminent and prominent satisfaction as "the very best" of anything.

You'll ultimately want a Victrola, because you'll ultimately want the best.

Why not purchase one at the start?

Why not call tomorrow and hear them played and arrange to have one sent you Christmas time?

What would make a more beautiful family gift?

What remembrance could give such lasting pleasure?

Think of it—a fireside theater of your own—a musical education in itself.

It costs more than any other talking machine because it is worth more.

It's an honor to own a Victrola.

Our Supreme Court Upheld

Of the works of reference for the legal profession of the United States there is no higher authority than "The Lawyers' Reports Annotated," published in New York. The editors of this work are critics of the courts, and they devote themselves to discussions of selected cases involving important principles, their purpose being to show wherein decisions are in harmony or at variance with the rules of law. Before taking up a case for discussion they read not only the decision of the court but also the briefs of the lawyers on both sides. Their aim of course is accuracy of statement and soundness of reasoning, and their competency is attested by the reputation of their reports which are to be found in every private and public law library in the country. In view of the high character of these reports it is very gratifying to learn that in the volumne which came to hand last week the judgment of our Supreme Court in the Schmitz case is approved. On account of its decision in that case the State's highest tribunal was pretty severely criticised; nay, it was villified and held up to the scorn of men. The decision itself was distorted, and through the medium, in some instances, of unscrupulous newspapers, and in others, of ignorant editors, the impression was created in this country and even in England that a California court had decided that blackmail was not a crime. We are now curious to see whether the newspapers that calumniated our Supreme Court; that intimated that the judges thereof had been influenced by politics or worse; that gave publicity to the ridiculous criticisms of obscure attorneys on the fringe of the profession, will now record the fact that a New York authority which cannot be suspected of any partisan interest in a controversy in California has declared that the theory of the court in the Schmitz case "is in harmony with such other cases as have had occasion to pass upon the question involved." A good deal has been said in the last two years of the importance of rehabilitating ourselves in the eyes of the world. Surely we should deem it of no small importance that the world should know that the highest tribunal of the State is not composed of men who would hold that blackmail is not a crime.

A Plan to Improve the Judiciary

A new scheme in furtherance of a much to be desired consummation—the separation of the judiciary from politics is to be advocated at the next session of the Legislature. After a great deal of talk during a long period of years on the importance of improving the method by which we select judges, at length a plan has been formed by which non-partisan judicial elections may be insured. This plan is embodied in the rough draft of a proposed new section of the political code which provides that the names of all candidates for judicial office shall appear in the first column on the ballot without any party designation and without any description save in the case of incumbents who shall be merely so designated. The rough draft further provides that "any incumbent of a judicial office may become a candidate for re-election and have his name placed upon the ballot simply by serving notice of his intention on the registrar." One of the commendable purposes of this proposed amendment is to render judges independent of machine influence. If adopted the result will be that no judge will ever feel that he is under obligations to a boss or to a political faction. So far as it goes the plan is excellent, but it does not provide for the elimination of all the elements that affect the independence of our judiciary. Our judges should be as independent of the people as of the corrupting influences of political machines, for the people are more or less swayed by the subtle persuasions of the demagogue who is quite as dangerous as the boss and far more despicable. We have heard in connection with plans for the improvement of the judiciary what we believe to be a wise suggestion, and it is this,—that some provision should be made for the selection of a presiding judge of the Superior Court of the State, and that he should be empowered to assign judges to duty wherever he sees fit. The object of this plan is to minimize the effect of local passions and prejudices.

A Sleuth in the Senate

Joseph Little Bristow, Senator-elect from Kansas, has consecrated himself publicly to the task of reforming the Federal judiciary. Mr. Bristow, though typical, is one of the most zealous of the country's reformers, and we earnestly commend his future career to the attention of our readers. We believe that Joseph Little Bristow will be worth watching. He was formerly Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General and he was the protege of Chester I. Long whom he has succeeded in the Senate. From Washington he went to Panama as a railroad examiner at $15 a day and expenses and $5 a day for a stenographer. When he left Washington he was the most cordially detested man that ever went out of the District of Columbia; for in the capacity of sleuth of the Postoffice Department, while exposing a great deal of graft, sloth, waste and inefficiency, he converted many a mole hill into a mountain and threw out some ill-founded insinuations damaging to the reputation alike of girl stenographers and distinguished statesmen. "The fact of the matter was," as somebody said, "Bristow was a demon for zeal to investigate everything and abnormally short on human nature." But his methods being sensational President Roosevelt took him to his bosom and gave him the Panama sinecure. He afterwards wrote to his friend Long that the way to get something out of Roosevelt was to cajole, flatter and bullyrag him, and he boasted that he would like himself to go after the President with the big stick. Subsequently Bristow coveted Long's job, formed an alliance with "Battle Bob" La Follette and in a contest for the Senate defeated the man who started him in his political career. It has been made evident that Mr. Bristow has not a lively sense of favors received, but he is a demon for zeal to investigate and he has ambition. Let us keep our eyes on him for the fun of the thing, and see to what heights his heroics will lead him.

Sound Journalism Promised

When the Evening Globe changed hands last week the Boughten Bulletin threw a spasm and emitted a shriek that must have been heartrending to the friends and admirers of the afflicted journal. Evidently the Bulletin doesn't relish keen rivalry. The mere promise of it occasioned a characteristic fulmination of overwhelming violence and a hysterical message pregnant with ominous warnings addressed to organized labor. The new owners of the Globe signalized their entrance into the local field of journalism with becoming modesty and a dignified salutatory, assuring us that they purposed holding aloof from factional strife and devoting themselves entirely to the business of publishing a newspaper. It ought not to be hard to believe that this sincerely is the purpose of the directors of the new Ocean Publishing Company; for the policy is the very one that would suggest itself to men of average sense entering upon a newspaper enterprise in San Francisco at this time. The situation in this city is peculiarly propitious for an independent, honest daily newpsaper, devoted to the welfare of all the people and entirely free from the impulse to defend a partisan course such as has been followed to some extent by every local journal. It is quite true, as the Globe says, that "there is no parallel in the annals of American newspaperdom for the bitter warfare which rival millionaires have waged in San Francisco during the last two decades, using newspapers as their weapons." And doubtless the people, especially the enlightened ones who are aware of all that this city has suffered by reason of the uses to which newspapers have been put by millionaire demagogues, will gladly give support and encouragement to a journal conducted with zealous adherence to the policy outlined by the new owners of the Globe.

Roosevelt on Safe Finance

Mr. Roosevelt has written another letter. His latest contribution to the art epistolary is not as suggestive nor as sugary as those he wrote to "Dear Maria," but it lacks nothing of the virile diction and sinewy syntax that characterized some of his oratory subsequent to the publication of those letters to Mrs. Storror. This letter is in answer to one written by William Dudley Foulke calling the President's attention to strictures on the Administration published in the Indianapolis News relating specifically to an accusation that the Government paid American citizens $40,000,000 for the Panama tract upon which they had invested but $12,000,000. Mr. Roosevelt's comment on this charge is emphatic but in no manner convincing. He says the statement is false. Now unless we are compelled to accept Mr. Roosevelt's statement as we should be compelled to accept the dictum of a despot ruling over us by divine right, we are at liberty to deny its absolute infallibility, thereby reducing the Rooseveltian imperative to an equality with a similar affirmation by the humblest citizen. In this circumstance we may even question the validity of the President's statement. It is not enough that Mr. Roosevelt shall denounce this or any other statement as false. He must bring corroborative proof of its falsity. He endeavors to do this by pleading the sophistry that as the money was paid directly by this Government to the French Government the mere supposition that any American received from the French Government a "rake off" is "too absurd to be discussed"; and he clinches his argument in the usual way—"it is an abominable falsehood and it is slander not against the American Government but against the French Government." Yet if Mr. Roosevelt had been as candid with his correspondent as he is with those upon whom he heaps his wrath in words not only short and ugly but frequently long and ambiguous, he would have admitted the bare possibility at least of an American-French lobby in the interest of the Panama canal investors under French operation. He would have intimated at least, that there might be some truth in the virtually admitted fact that the American investors did lobby to further the purchase of the Panama canal for $40,000,000; that the French investors did lobby with the French Government for the sale of the canal at that figure; and that there was a very close conspiracy between the Americans and the Frenchmen to accomplish the purpose in hand. This is what the Indianapolis News meant, and there is good reason to believe that Mr. Roosevelt was fully aware of the meaning. The attitude of Mr. Roosevelt in this matter is very similar to his attitude in relation to the charge by Judge Parker that the presidential candidacy of Mr. Roosevelt was pecuniarily assisted by the trusts and corporations. His language in that instance was almost synonymous with that which he now uses in denial of an important financial transaction in which the Roosevelt administration has been largely interested. Yet it is now known to the fraction of a dollar how much money was contributed for the election of Mr. Roosevelt; and the nation is especially well informed regarding the amount that was contributed to that fund by Mr. E. H. Harriman.

Mr. Laffan's Ugly Word

In this letter to Mr. Foulke Mr. Roosevelt kills another bird with the same stone. Perhaps he thought it was a good opportunity to clear off a lot of old standing scores. So he takes down his brotherless sling and hurls a rock as big as a paving cobble at Mr. Laffan of the New York Sun. It is not that Mr. Laffan has been accusing the administration or the brother of William H. Taft, with unholy dealings in the Panama canal matter; it is rather in the nature of a general indictment of the editor of the Sun for "every form of mendacity known to man, from the suppression of the truth and the suggestion of the false, to the lie direct." Mr. Laffan, however, is an editor who knows by long experience with men like unto Mr. Roosevelt, how to take care of himself in a controversy of this kind. He crumples Mr. Roosevelt in an editorial of not more than forty lines in which he gracefully acknowledges the compliment of Mr. Roosevelt's disfavor, and then proceeds to his demolition in forthright Roosevelt style by stating in language well within the courtesy of parliamentary usage that a person who is "capable of suppression and perversion of individual correspondence," would in ordinary life "in the cognizance of any club or association of self-respecting gentlemen, suffer his prompt expulsion." If this plain allusion to some guilty reminiscence of the life of Mr. Roosevelt is not lese majesty; what would you call it? But apparently Mr. Roosevelt is helpless. He cannot reply to Mr. Laffan. He may be rash to the verge of a reckless hardihood; but he is not at all eager to meet Mr. Laffan in the arena of this sharp debate. Moreover, Mr. Laffan has classified one of Mr. Roosevelt's letters to Mr. Foulke, denying that he was using the Federal patronage to aid Mr. Taft's candidacy, "among the most valued incunabula of veracity." And Mr. Roosevelt has the good judgment to avoid combat with an antagonist who knows the use of such an ugly word as "incunabula."

The Passion for Flaws

Meredith Nicholson's name has been added to the list of "nature fakers." Mr. Nicholson mentioned robins nesting above Nimrod's grave in the cathedral church yard of Columbia, and the Secretary of the Historical Commission of South Carolina has entered a vigorous protest. Robins, it seems, do not appear in South Carolina during nesting time. Mr. Nicholson's criminal propensity to misrepresent robins was revealed in the pages of "The Little Brown Jug at Kildare," a whimsical succession of improbabilities which would be about the last place any one would think of going in search of natural history; but apparently we are breeding up a race of critics who are in their way as agreeable to meet and as useful to art and science as a cloud of gnats. To coin a clever phrase and use it with slight variation on every possible occasion is to pose as a profound wit with one set of these self-constituted judges. To discover minute and unimportant misstatements is to another set the occasion for them to spring forward and condemn, wholesale and entire what, but for the one triviality, is beyond their power to appreciate. "Little localized powers, and little narrow streaks of specialized knowledge are things men are very apt to be conceited about," said the Autocrat. One may no longer enjoy a good story simply and only because the plot is original and entertaining and the characters vital. Louise Imogen Guiney's definition of reading, well, "to make an impalpable snatch at whatever item takes your eye, and run," will not do in these days. No, we must sit down and laboriously unjoint each sentence, turn every word over, scrape and file and test with acid, and if the bright glitter of pyrites catches the sun it will never do to enjoy the yellow sparkle. Nothing but solid gold shall content us. Rather must we do without pleasure than accept it thoughtlessly and without due proof. If some one inadvertently mentions spring violets, almanac and calendar and the tabulated reports of the weather bureau must be consulted in order that day and date may be certified to. Violets on the fifth of May and none officially reported until the seventh! Away with him! Nature faker! A robin where a red bird would seem more appropriate? What are facts beside scientific theories? A Piute squaw in Alaska? The critic never met one and that settles it for time and eternity. Let us recall "Lang Tammas" of Thrums, who held the view, contrary to that of his countryman, that Burns's poems had an immoral tendency. Tammas admitted that he had never read them, but nevertheless he asserted his "opeenion," which was quite as valuable as about one-half of what today passes for literary criticism in so-called educated society.

Exit the Toy Dog

"There is no great loss without some small gain." It is reported from the centers of fashion that the introduction of the Directoire style of garmenture has affected a corresponding change in the modish dog. My lady has discovered that her trailing and clinging skirts make it inconvenient for her to be bothered with the small varieties which have been in vogue with short skirts, and what is far more important to a lady of quality, that the toy canines are "out of the picture," so the "dearest doggie in the world" is to be cast aside like last season's hat, and something more in keeping with the long lines of the Directoire and the umbrella hat is to be introduced. The doggie woman will of course continue to make herself ridiculous, and though the dog jeweler may find his stock of tiny bracelets and rings dead on his hands there will be no dearth of dogs for St. Bernards and Great Danes will now be converted into bedizened absurdities. And for awhile we shall be spared the unpleasantness of tripping over leashes and stepping on squirming bunches of muscle in every crowd. So let us be thankful for small mercies. One might imagine, from the care and expense lavished on a woman's dog, that she had some affection for the animal which would to some extent be an excuse for her conduct, but as a matter of fact the dog is discarded with little if any greater regret than is felt at the passing of a discarded husband. The poodle superseded the black and tan, and the pug ousted the poodle, and the bull and the terrier have climbed to comfort each in turn. Fashion one year decrees that the dog must match dress and apparently there is no more difficulty in the way than there is in providing a parasol. The next season some other fad is introduced, and that too passes into history. The surprising thing is that when any particular breed is out of favor, not only the individual dog, but seemingly the whole breed, disappears. What becomes of them nobody seems to know. If they were sold second-hand at a discount or passed down to poor relations or given to the servants they would still be in evidence somewhere. It is hardly possible that they can be "made over" so as to defy detection, and it is equally certain that they cannot be kept in storage. Enter the Directoire, exit the toy dog, but what is to become of him? As sure as fate he will vanish.

They chatter all the livelong day

To them the silence ever seems

Curiosities of Literature

By Theodore Bonnet

Dr. Harry Thurston Peck has put an end to the dispute which has been raging for twenty years over the authorship of that popular baseball lyric, "Casey at the Bat." In the December "Scrap Book" Dr. Peck presents a volume of testimony on the subject (some of which I was able to contribute) and his decision is that the verses were written by Ernest L. Thayer and first published in the San Francisco Examiner. Thayer's claim to the credit of authorship was disputed by a George W. D'Vys, whose inability to write so colorful and spirited a ballad was evidenced by the style of his correspondence on the subject; but aside from this circumstance by the very testimony he offered in support of his claim he was convicted of a barefaced attempt to defraud Thayer of deserved fame.

By this controversy I have been reminded that among the notable pieces of literature the authorship of which was for a time the subject of dispute is the "Ode on the Burial of Sir John Moore." Familiar as almost everybody is with that poem few there are that know anything of its history, and not on the tip of every one's tongue is the name of the author. The poem was written in 1814 by Charles Wolfe, a graduate of Dublin University, and it was not until 1824, some years after his death, that he was given credit for the performance. The history of the poem is contained in the works of Sydney Taylor which are now, I believe, out of print but a copy of which is in my possession. It was Taylor that brought posthumous fame to Wolfe.

In the London Chronicle of October 27, 1824, there appeared copious extracts from Medwin's "Conversations of Lord Byron," from which Taylor learned that Byron was believed to be the author of the ode. According to Medwin, at a dinner one evening Shelley, Byron and others got into a dispute over the question as to which was the most perfect ode that had been written in that age. Shelley contended for Coleridge's on Switzerland beginning "Ye Clouds," etc. Somebody suggested Campbell's Hohenlinden, which Byron scoffed at saying "Campbell like Gray smells too much of the oil." Thereupon he produced a magazine saying, "I will show you an ode you have never seen, that I consider little inferior to the best which the present prolific age has brought forth," and he read the "Ode on the Burial of Sir John Moore." When he had come to the end he repeated the third stanza and said it was perfect, particularly the lines:

> "But he lay like a warrior taking his rest,
> With his martial cloak around him."

Medwin said he was of the opinion that Byron was the author of the poem; that Byron "had been piqued at none of his odes being mentioned, and after he had praised the verses so highly, could not own them." And Medwin added, "I am corroborated in this opinion by a lady, whose brother received them many years ago from Lord Byron, in his Lordship's own handwriting."

Sydney Taylor, in his letter to the Chronicle, after paying a tribute to the talents of Charles Wolfe said:

"I well recollect the expression of mingled diffidence and enthusiasm with which he communicated to me his tribute to the memory of Sir John Moore. He had then written but the first and last verses, and had no intention of adding any others. The thought was inspired while reading an account of the death of the Marcellus of Corunna in some periodical work; the approbation which those two verses received from the fellow-students to whom he showed them—among whom were the Rev. J. O'Sullivan, now vicar of St. Catherine's, Dublin, the Rev. Mr. Dickenson, and, I believe, Mr. Gierson of the Irish Bar, and one or two more—induced him to extend the design, and finish the ode in the form, though not exactly worded as it came into Lord Byron's hands. When he showed it to me completed which, I think, was some time in the year 1814, I did not take a copy of it, but the verses impressed themselves indelibly on my recollection. I heard, a few years afterwards, when we separated for different pursuits in life, that a copy of them, without the participation of Wolfe, had got into an Irish newspaper, whence they were copied into a magazine. I did not see them published until they reappeared within the last year in The Devizes Gazette, under the title of 'The Dead Soldier.' They had, I presume, been all this time circulating about from one journal to another, and the author never took the pains of correcting the errors which have been perpetuated from the first imperfect copy to that which Captain Medwin has given to the public. These errors detract greatly from the spirit and beauty of the original. I shall correct them, and restore the ode to the state in which it came from the hands of the author, as my memory has always been tenacious of every syllable of it. The fame of Sappho is realized by a solitary fragment. The existence of Wolfe will be remembered by one of the shortest, but one of the most impressive odes in the language."

The poem as given to the London Chronicle by Taylor was as follows:

> Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note,
> As his corse to the rampart we hurried;
> Not a soldier discharged his farewell shot
> O'er the grave where our hero we buried.
> We buried him darkly at dead of night,
> The sods with our bayonets turning,—
> By the struggling moonbeams misty light,
> And the lantern dimly burning.
> No useless coffin confined his breast,
> Nor in sheet nor in shroud we wound him.
> But he lay like a warrior, taking his rest,
> With his martial cloak around him.
> Few and short were the prayers we said,
> And we spoke not a word of sorrow;
> But we steadfastly gaz'd on the face that was dead,
> And we bitterly thought of the morrow.
> We thought, as we hollow'd his narrow bed,
> And smooth'd down his lonely pillow,
> That the foe and the stranger would tread o'er his head
> And we far away on the billow!
> Lightly they'll talk of the spirit that's gone,
> And o'er his cold ashes upbraid him;
> But nothing he'll reck, if they let him sleep on
> In the grave where a Briton has laid him.
> But half of our heavy task was done,
> When the clock told the hour for retiring;
> And we heard the distant and random gun,
> Of the enemy sullenly firing.
> Slowly and sadly we laid him down,
> From the field of his fame fresh and gory;
> We carved not a line and we raised not a stone,
> But we left him alone with his glory.

From Taylor one learns of the errors that appeared in the verses when they were first circulated; even when they were praised by Byron. For example:

> "Not a drum was heard, nor a funeral note," was the first line in the garbled copy of the ode. In the fourth verse the third line was printed,

> "We steadfastly gazed on the face of the dead."

"The poet," said Taylor, "did not mean to tell us merely the fact that the comrades of Moore gazed upon the face of their dead chief, but he meant to convey an idea of the impression which that form made upon them. They gazed on the face 'that was dead.' gives not merely the fact but the sentiment of death. It is like some of those fine Scriptural expressions where the simplest terms are exuberant with imagination. It intimates the awful contrast between the heroic animation which kindled up that countenance just before in action, and its now cold, ghastly and appalling serenity."

In the fifth verse, the first line by an abbreviation of the proper quantity was turned into prose causing a loss of the sense.

"We thought as we heaped his narrow bed," was the line as printed before Taylor called attention to the error. But worse havoc was made of the seventh verse. The third and fourth lines as given by Medwin were:

And we heard by the distant and random gun,
That the foe was suddenly firing.

"I need scarcely," said Taylor, "point out to any reader of the least poetic taste the incomparable superiority of the true passage to the fictitious one. The statement of the foe being 'suddenly firing' implies a new and vigorous attack, which was contrary to the fact. The lines as Wolfe wrote them are better poetry and more agreeable to the truth. They represent the enemy who had come on with the flush of anticipated victory, now sullen in defeat, firing rather from vain irritation than useful valor, keeping up a show of hostilities by the 'distant and random gun,' but not venturing on any fresh or animated onset."

According to Taylor, the poet, having indulged an honorable passion which led to hopeless disappointment, he lost all taste for the world, entered the church and accepted a curacy in the North of Ireland, in a poor and populous neighborhood, where his zeal, unaffected benevolence and freedom from everything like clerical ambition, made him realize Goldsmith's clergyman in all but internal happiness. "Residing in another country," says Taylor, "I had not seen him for some time; but every account which I heard of him bore testimony to the life of actual usefulness but gradual martyrdom, which he had chosen. About two years ago I heard that death had closed the story of his misfortunes, his talents and his virtues. I could not omit this opportunity of giving to his memory the fame so justly his due; I could not allow the one solitary, but everlasting laurel which ought to ornament his urn, to be torn from the tomb of his departed genius. What could enhance the reputation of Byron would be capable of conferring distinction on any poet. It is also right that the public should know who it really was that visited with the homage of the finest inspiration, the neglected grave of the gallant Moore and consecrated it with poetic glory."

Master Cornille's Secret

Translated from the French of Alphonse Daudet.

The old fifer, Francet Mamai, told me the story one evening over a bottle of mulled wine. I will tell it as I heard it.

In this old province years ago, my dear Monsieur, there was a big business done in grinding grain. The hills round about were covered with windmills and every day there could be seen long strings of donkeys laden with bags of grain on their way to the mills. Those were pleasant days. On Sundays we went to the mills in groups. The millers treated to muscat. The millers' wives were as lovely as queens, with their lace neckerchiefs and their gold crosses. I used to carry my fife, and we danced farandoles till it was pitch-dark. Those mills, you see, were the pleasure and wealth of our province.

Unluckily, some Frenchmen from Paris conceived the idea of setting up a steam flourmill on the road to Tarascon. Very fine and new it was; the people fell into the habit of sending their grain there, and the poor windmills were left without work. For some time they tried to keep up the struggle, but steam was the stronger, and one after another, pecaire! they were all obliged to close. We say no more strings of little donkeys. The millers' pretty wives sold their gold crosses. No more muscat! no more farandoles. No matter how hard the mistral might blow, the sails did not move. Then, one fine day, the commune ordered all those shanties torn down, and vines and olive-trees were planted where they stood.

But, amid all the distraction, one little mill held out and continued to turn bravely on its hill, in despite of the steam-millers. That was Master Cornille's mill, the same one in which we are passing the evening at this moment.

Master Cornille was an old miller, who had lived for sixty years in flour and was crazy over his trade. The setting up of the steammills made him act like a madman. For a week he ran about the village, collecting people round him and shouting at the top of his lungs that they intended to poison Provence with the flour from the steam-mills.

"Don't go there," he would say; "those villians use steam to make bread, steam, which is an invention of the devil, while I work with the mistral and the tramontana, which are the breath of the good Lord"; and he would spout a lot of fine words in praise of windmills, but no one listened to them.

Then, in a towering rage, the old man shut himself up in his mill, and lived alone like a wild beast. He wouldn't even keep with him his granddaughter Vivette, a child of fifteen, who since the death of her parents had no one but her grandfather in the world. The poor child was obliged to earn her living and to hire herself out among the farms for the harvest, the silkworm season, or the olive picking. And yet her grandfather seemed to love the child dearly. He often traveled four leagues on foot in the heat of the sun to see her at the farm where she was working, and when he was with her, he would pass hours at a time gazing at her and weeping.

In the province, people thought that the old miller had been led by avarice to send Vivette away; and it did not do to him credit to allow his grandchild to travel about that way from one farm to another, exposed to the brutality of the laborers and to all the trials of young women in service. People thought it very wrong, too, that a man of Master Cornille's reputation, who up to that time had shown the greatest self-respect, should go about through the streets like a regular gyspy, barefooted, with a cap all holes and a blouse all in rags. The fact is that on Sunday, when we saw him come in to mass, we were ashamed for him, we old men; and Cornille felt it so keenly that he didn't dare to come and sit in the warden's pew; he always remained at the back of the church, near the holy-water vessel, with the poor.

There was something in Master Cornille's life we couldn't understand. For a long time no one in the village had carried him any grain, and yet the sails of his windmill were always in motion as before. In the evening, people met the old miller on the roads driving before him his donkey loaded with fat bags of flour.

"Good evening, Master Cornille," the peasants would call out to him; "is business still good?"

"Still good, my children," the old man would reply, with a jovial air. "Thank God, we have no lack of work."

Then, if any one asked where in the devil so much work could come from, he would put a finger to his lips and answer gravely:

"Hush! I am working for exportation."

No one could ever get anything more from him.

As for putting one's nose inside his mill, it wasn't to be thought of. Even little Vivette herself never went in there.

When people passed in front of it, they always found the door closed, the huge sails moving, the old ass browsing on the platform, and a great thin cat taking a sun-bath on the window-sill, and glaring at them with a wicked expression.

All this smelt of mystery, and made people talk a great deal. Every one had his own explanation of Master Cornille's secret, but the general report was that there were even more bags of silver in the mill than bags of grain.

After a while, however, everything came to light; this is how it happened:

One fine day, as I was playing on my fife for the young people to dance, I noticed that my eldest boy and little Vivette had fallen in love with each other. At heart I was not displeased, because after all the name of Cornille was held in honor among us, and then it would have pleased me to see that pretty little bird of a Vivette trotting about my house. But as our lovers had often had opportunities to be together, I determined, for fear of accidents, to settle the business at once, and I went up to the mill to say a word to the grandfather. Ah! the old sorcerer! you should have seen how he received me! It was impossible for me to induce him to open his door. I explained my reasons after a fashion, through the keyhole; and all the time I was talking, there was that lean villain of a cat snorting like a devil over my head.

The old man didn't give me time to finish, but shouted to me most impolitely to go back to my fife; that if I was in such a hurry to marry my boy, I could go and look for a girl at the steam-mill. As you can imagine, the blood went to my head when I heard such rough talk; but I was wise enough to restrain myself, and leaving the old fool in his mill, I returned to inform the children of my discomfiture. The poor lambs couldn't believe it; they asked me as a favor to allow them to go up together to the mill and speak to the grandfather. I hadn't the courage to refuse, and off my lovers went.

Just as they reached the mill, Master Cornille had gone out. The door was securely locked; but the old fellow, when he went away, had left his ladder outside, and suddenly it occurred to the children to go in by the window and see what there might be inside that famous mill.

What a strange thing! the main room of the mill was empty. Not a sack, not a particle of grain; not the slightest trace of flour on the walls or on the spiderwegs. They couldn't even smell that pleasant, warm odor of ground wheat that makes the air of a mill so fragrant. The shaft was covered with dust and the huge thin cat was sleeping on it.

The lower room had the same aspect of poverty and neglect: a wretched bed, a few rags, a crust of bread on one stair, and in a corner three or four bursted sacks, with rubbish and plaster sticking out.

That was Master Cornille's secret! It was that plaster that he paraded at night on the roads, to save the honor of the mill and to make people think that he made flour there. Poor mill! poor Cornille! Long ago the steam-millers had robbed them of their last customer. The sails still turned, but the mill ground nothing.

The children returned to me all in tears and told me what they had seen. It tore my heart to listen to them. Without a moment's loss of time I ran to the neighbors; I told them the story in two words, and we agreed instantly that we must carry to Cornille's mill all the wheat there was in the houses. No sooner said than done. The whole village started off, and we arrived at the top of the hill with a procession of donkeys loaded with grain, and real grain, too!

The mill was wide open. In front of the door Master Cornille sat on a bag of plaster, weeping, with his face in his hands. He had discovered on returning home that during his absence some one had entered his mill and discovered his sad secret.

Poor me!" he said. "Now there's nothing left for me to do but to die. The mill is dishonored."

And he sobbed as if his heart would break, calling his mill by all sorts of names, speaking to it as if it was a living person.

At that moment the donkeys arrived on the platform and we all began to shout as we did in the palmy days of the millers:

"Holla! mill there! holla! Master Cornille!"

And the bags were piled up before the door and the fine red grain strewed the earth in all directions.

Master Cornille stared with all his eyes. He took up some grain in the hollow of his old hand, and said,

"It is grain! Lord God! real grain! Leave me; let me look at it."

Then, turning to us:

"Ah! I knew that you'd come back to me. All those steam-millers are thieves."

We proposed to carry him in triumph to the village.

"No, no, my children," he said; "first of all I must give my mill something to eat. Just think! it's so long since he has had anything between his teeth!"

And it brought the tears to the eyes of us all to see the poor old man rush about to right and left, emptying the sacks, looking after the millstone, while the grain was crushed and the fine wheaten dust rose to the ceiling.

I must do our people justice: from that day we never allowed the old miller to lack work. Then one morning Master Cornille died, and the sails of our last mill ceased to turn—this time forever. When Cornille was dead, no one followed in his footsteps. What can you expect, monsieur? Everything has an end in this world, and we must believe that the day of windmills has passed, like that of barges on the Rhone, parliaments, and jackets with flowers.

Why the Press Club Will Move

When Bohemia of the curtained cabinet invades the vestibule of the Fourth Estate it is full time for the journalists to think of removing their lares and penates to more secluded quarters. This is what has happened to the Press Club of this city. Not that the newspapermen individually are prudes or that they are averse from excursions into the purlieus of Alsatia; but collectively they must maintain the dignity of a profession that has assumed a moral protectorate over the rest of the community. Hence, when they discovered that the sacred Ibis was being profaned by the presence of veiled prophetesses under escort of high and low priests of Apis the sacred buffalo of Memphis, they deciced to notify Jerry Lynch, their Egyptian landlord, that he had violated his contract and that they felt under no obligation, legal or otherwise, to remain under his roof. Indeed they feel that Jerry should be mulcted in damages for the contamination which they must escape. This they swore by Isis and Osiris and pledged their unsullied reputation as a club on the oath. What Jerry will say when he hears that the Press Club is going to move away from its present Bush street apartments and peradventure may sue him, I am not prophet enough to predict. It is quite certain, however, that the newspapermen feel justified in cancelling their lease and making their Egyptian landlord pay the piper. When the club accepted Lynch's offer to provide club rooms in his building they supposed the French restaurant on the ground floor would stay there. They had no idea that it would come upstairs and that the elevators would be crowded with gentlemen and their affinities elbowing and sometimes even jostling the young men of the press, whose duty it is to print unkind things about affinities and to write ironically of the male persons who clothe these hybrid ladies and wine them while dining in the little supper rooms of the French restaurants. To say that the newspapermen were shocked by the contact is putting it very mildly—they were dumfounded, dazed, utterly dejected. This is why the Press Club is moving from the sacred Ibis to the new Academy of Sciences building, now in process of construction. Better "the scent that steals from the crumbling sheet where a mummy is half unrolled," than "the faint, sweet smell of the jasmine flower"; better the ancient odors of beasts pliocene than the musky fumes that cling to the plumage of the sacred Ibis since the French restaurant came upstairs; better the companionship of owls and the brotherhood of dragons than the presence of sirens flushed with wine and the association of Aspasias and Lamias babbling of matters foolish to their gilded prey. The Press Club has determined to remove its unsullied scutcheon from the outward portal of Jerry Lynch's house of mirth and betake themselves to an environment of stratified culture and fossilized respectability. The Ibis may thereafter wear her plumes aslant, like a painted coquette; she may preen and prink from cellar to garret, she may ruffle and flutter through every corridor—the gentlemen of the press will not be there to frown their disapproval; unless, perchance, it shall be in the line of duty as honest chroniclers of the flaunting immoralities of the age.

Directors in Solemn Discussion

Since the foregoing was written the directors of the club held a meeting to discuss the subject of moving. Had they attended that meeting misinformed mortals who imagine that newspaperdom is a province of Bohemia situated somewhere east of conscience where there ain't no ten commandments and a man can quench his thirst for all sorts of dissipation, would have had their half-baked notions dispelled. Morality never got more venerable recognition at a presbyterian synod or at an ecumenical council. For the genial weaknesses of the flesh that are popularly supposed to be good naturedly condoned where newspapermen move and have their being, there was naught but the forbidding frown and the cut direct. The azure-eyed goddess of respectability received the most humble homage of the officers of the Press Club. At this meeting it was learned that the conditions which have alligned the board of managers uncompromisingly on the side of the line that separates human frailty from puritanic virtue, are of recent making. The tenant of that good-humored, tolerant digger in Egyptian silt, Jerry Lynch, the Press Club, ever since its removal from the Withrow home in Pine street to the Ibis building in Bush street above Kearny, had maintained friendly relations with the proprietors of the Old Poodle Dog which found its luxurious and epicurean kennel downstairs. All went to the gustatory satisfaction of the newspaper clubmen and to the financial satisfaction of the restaurateurs until the board of managers of the Press Club discovered that Jerry Lynch had persuaded the Gallic bonifaces that every consideration of profit warranted them in taking the upper floors of the Ibis building and converting them into one of those gay establishments that have made the names of the San Francisco French restaurants world-famous.

An Awful State of Affairs

The restaurateurs consented to take the rest of the building off landlord Lynch's hands and on the first of December the four floors above the restaurant and below the Press Club quarters blossomed forth in all the discreet luxury that associates itself in the memory of jolly rakes and frolicsome matrons with the name "Poodle Dog." The carpets are yielding to the tread, the waiters are impassive and unseeing, the—but description is superfluous. And yet, alack and alas, the frou frou of silken skirts, the tinkle of glasses, the popping of corks and the murmur of hushed laughter do not liven as they should the corridors of the new establishment. The solemn Ibis limned above the doorway does not look down upon the eager coming and the stealthy going of muffled couples. The reason is plain. There is but one elevator in the building and what knowing man about town will venture the good name of his light o' love on the chance of running full tilt against a keen-eyed newspaperman entering or leaving the Press Club? So business is poor above the restaurant floor and the genial Jerry and the shortsighted bonifaces are in despair. Of course the club is going to move, despite a ten years' lease, and equally of course, landlord Lynch is trying his best to make explanations to the indignant newspapermen who were not consulted when the naughty expansion of the restaurant was planned and executed.

The club is not yet out, but it is decidedly injured and has had to cancel arrangements for a Christmas dance. Rumor has it that Lynch will have difficulty in placating the indignant newspapermen who certainly did not mince words at a recent board meeting in telling him what they thought of his recent arrangement with the restaurateurs.

Has the Poet Jumped the Traces

Much speculation has been generated by the pregnant but foundling rumor that a fatal clash has occurred between Mayor Taylor and the Powers That Be. No authoritative information, however, can be obtained on the subject. While on the surface it appears that the City Hall poet of platonic passion has incurred the enmity of Mr. Phelan and Mr. Spreckels and the editors that voice their emotions, the suspicion prevails that the family row is in the nature of a theatrical performance designed to delude the groundlings. It is not taken in some quarters any more seriously than was the rumored clash with Chief Biggy at the time of the inception of that official's quarrel with Detective Burns. But since the tragic close of Biggy's career many observers of the march of events have become inclined to the opinion that Poet Taylor has really kicked over the traces. It now looks to them as though the men that run the machine really have the old poet on their nerves.

Some Allusions to His Honor

Some months ago the men behind the machine expressed themselves as being heartily in favor of renominating Poet Taylor. But after he refused to fire Biggy and give them control of the Police Department they began making disparaging remarks and contemptuous commentaries which I can hardly reproduce in their original felicity and grace of rhetoric. "He can smack the lyre and hypnotize the animals," said a noble time-serving journalist, "but the time for him is not when serious and useful measures are afoot. We'll give him the ax next fall." And "Slippery Jimmy" Phelan is said to have referred to him as an old troubadour "who serves well enough to speed the joyous process of digestion with the melting music of his lilting prose." But perhaps the hardest smash that has been taken at him was that delivered by that coiner of epigrams, Gavin McNab, who has been known to ridicule more than one man into obscurity. McNab thinks the Administration is suffering from too much McKannay, and he remarked the other day, "McKannay is rocking the cradle of Mayor Taylor's second childhood very gently."

A Letter to "Slippery Jimmy"

McNab is incensed at the Mayor for refusing to appoint Tim Fitzpatrick to succeed Judge Cabaniss in the Police Court. And by the way, Mr. Phelan affects displeasure for the same reason. But what "Slippery Jimmy's" real emotions are nobody knows. Fitzpatrick stepped aside in the last Democratic convention to permit Mr. Phelan and his associates to put through their program, and for doing so he was promised the position which Mayor Taylor has resolved to give to Dan Deasy, an excellent young man, son of the ex-Supervisor and member of the Oliver grand jury. Phelan says that he earnestly advocated the appointment of Fitzpatrick and that Taylor turned him down. By way of evidence he has shown to several persons a letter from the poet enclosing a clipping from the Call in which it was said that if the Mayor should refuse to appoint Fitzpatrick the McNabites would pull out his whiskers. "If I decide not to appoint Fitzpatrick," said Taylor to Phelan, "it will be because of the methods adopted by his friends." From this it would appear that the poet, old as he is, is not unaware of the source of some of the Call's inspirations.

No Surrender for E. Robson Taylor

This letter from Taylor to Phelan ought perhaps to be accepted as conclusive of the gallant young patriot's loyalty to Fitzpatrick; but not so. So well established is Mr. Phelan's reputation for artful dissimulation, for his ability to frame his face to occasion, that it has been suggested that he procured the letter for the purpose to which it has been applied. It is pointed out that it would be natural for Phelan to prefer Deasy to Fitzpatrick as Deasy's father was one of the pets of his Administration and also a member of the Oliver grand jury. But whatever may be the facts it is fairly certain that the Bard of the City Hall is very fond of the fattest of his several jobs and expects to be renominated; whether with or without the assistance of the Powers That Be is a question I cannot solve. For me it is only to record current opinion, and such contemporary gossip as may be considered amiable and interesting. In pursuance of this function it is but proper to report that the Mayor is pronounced at the City Hall a man of great vigor and not in the least inclined to retire to private life at the behest of the machine which he has helped to build. Indeed it is said that he is prepared, if needs be, to toss away the plectrum and grasp the bungstarter. And I hear that he has received words of cheer from the Spinners' Club. from the Daughters of the Founders and The Female Progeny of Famous Poets; also, that all those that dwell in the bracing air of immediate proximity are with him with honest rapture. From them he hears nothing but diapasons of enthusiastic reverence; smells nothing but the incense of devotion.

Mrs. Frills—"Now that I have engaged you, Bridget, I am going to begin at once to give you a little training in the art of waiting on guests. You see, my daughter is coming out next month—"

How the News Got Out

Far from agreeable were the emotions that surged through District Attorney Langdon's office when the Examiner published the news of the Blake marriage in San Rafael, which the astute Mr. Langdon had arranged with great secrecy and carried out with consummate surreption. How the Examiner got hold of the story was a great mystery to Mr. Langdon who was laboring under the delusion that anything that takes place in San Rafael is as profound a secret as the name of the man who designed the Martian canals. The fact is that the newspapers have correspondents in San Rafael, but as there isn't enough doing in all of Marin County to keep a correspondent busy, the journalists of that burg avoid mental atrophy by engaging in the practice of two or three professions. Now it happens that the Examiner's San Rafael correspondent beguiles the time that otherwise would be leisure by performing the functions of a justice of the peace. A Third Term for de Young

The members of the Union League Club are not to have the excitement of a contest over the presidency. Some weeks ago Mr. M. H. de Young, who has held the office through two terms, announced that he would not be a candidate for re-election. As he had devoted a great deal of his time to the club in the last two years and as the club was once more in a flourishing condition he felt that there was nothing more for him to do, but the members were not pleased with the prospect of his retirement. So well did they appreciate Mr. de Young's services that they decided to urge him to remain at the helm. Meanwhile Mr. William H. Jordan had resolved to become a candidate for the presidency, but a petition having been drawn up and signed by six hundred members urging Mr. de Young to take the office for another term, both gentlemen decided to abide by the sentiment of the club. Mr. Jordan having withdrawn in favor of Mr. de Young the latter's election will be unaminous.

Polk's Epigrams on Redding

Joseph D. Redding has written the libretto of a genuine American opera, which Herbert, the opera composer, will set to music. All Californians will be glad to hear that their versatile fellow citizen has done this thing, but those who know Redding in all of his manifold roles, wonder why he let Herbert share the glory of the production, when it would have been so easy for him to have composed the music with one hand while he wrote the libretto with the other. Willis Polk is one of Redding's ardent admirers in whose mind this regret doubtless rankles, for, at the last jinks of the Bohemian Club he told the members assembled that he had taxed his friend with not writing the opera; that is to say, he had interrogated Redding thus: "I say, Joe, you didn't write that opera, did you?" Redding retorted with another question: "Why? What makes you think I didn't write it?" Whereupon Polk answered, "Because it is you; and because I read it in the newspapers." Which is one form of the epigram. And Polk also related at the same time in the same connection that he imagined in a very vivid dream that he stood in front of the temple of fame as Redding emerged from that repository of the immortal great. "Did you see my bust in there?" proudly questioned the man that beat Zukertort at chess. "No," answered Polk; "where is it?" "The third on the left," said Redding. "The third on the left!" exclaimed Polk; "why that isn't you; that's Shakespeare." "I know it," calmly admitted the librettist. "That's what they used to call me."

Francis Thompson—Poet

The anthologies have not yet included the name of Francis Thompson among those whom they make immortal; but they will. Francis Thompson was a poet. He lived a poet and he died a poet. His life was an iliad of misery and his death was a prolonged agony. It is said that he died because he did not have enough to eat. Francis Thompson was an incarnation of the seventeenth century; he wrote as Crashaw and Donne and Vaughan wrote, and whatever of the modern spirit was in his work he learned from Coventry Patmore. It is somewhat of a literary coincidence that two great English reviewers commented upon the merits and defects of Francis Thompson's verse at wide interval, each of them passing a critical judgment that might have been written by the same hand. In 1894, shortly after the publication of Thompson's poems, H. D. Trail, in the Nineteenth Century, welcomed the new poet in these words: "I can hardly doubt that at least the minority who can recognize the essentials under the accidents of poetry, and who feel that it is to poetic form only, and not to forms that eternity belongs—will agree that alike in wealth and dignity of imagination, in depth and subtlety of thought, and in magic and mastery of language, a new poet of the first rank is to be welcomed in the author of this volume." In 1907, ten days after the dawn-death of this poet who had "chanted in his chapel of dreams," Arthur Symons wrote in the Saturday Review, of London: "The genius of Francis Thompson was oriental, exuberant in color, woven into elaborate patterns, and went draped in old silken robes, that had survived many dynasties. . . . His voice was heard like a wandering music, which no one heeded for what it said, in a strange tongue, but which came troublingly into the mind, bringing it the solace of its old, recaptured melodies. Other poets of his time have had deeper things to say, and a more flawless beauty; others have put more of their hearts into their song; but no one has been a torch waved with so fitful a splendor over the gulfs of our darkness." This was the hail and farewell to a poet who is only now coming into his own—a prophecy and a threnody.

Belated Appreciation

The memory of Francis Thompson will live. It will grow upon us as we come to a full comprehension of his "fine and significant symbolism," realizing that his legacy of verse to an appreciative posterity is "an elaborate pageant of his own life, with all its miseries, heights, relapses, and flight after some eternity"; learning to know, better than we now know, but as he knew, that

> "Life is a coquetry
> Of Death, which wearies me,
> Too sure
> Of the amour;
> A tiring-room where I
> Death's divers garments try,
> Till fit
> Some fashion sit."

All men sometimes think these thoughts but few of them feel them as Thompson felt them, or are capable of presenting them even to themselves in clearest vision of fearless meditation as vividly as they are presented in word-welded imagery by this poet "who passed like a wild vagabond of the mind, dazzling our sight." Now the newspapers are "discovering" Francis Thompson; and eventually he will be known to all who are willing to come under the spell of a mind that combined intellectual vigor with spiritual insight and had the genius to give fluent and clear expression to the vast theme that engrossed his soul.

An Outcry From Chico

The schoolmarms of Chico are embattled grammar-wise against President Burk of the San Francisco State Normal School, because, in a recent bulletin he "discredits grammar and decries the teaching of grammar." These feminine precisians of Chico have adopted resolutions reaffirming their faith in Lindley Murray and all his works, insisting that the "rules" of grammar shall be taught in the schools, and denouncing in no uncertain, but somewhat discursive terms, all persons who would seek to lay hand save in kindness upon the prescriptive syntax of the English language. It would be easy to find fault with the "grammar" of these resolutions and to pick inconsequential flaws in their diction; but I forbear. I recall that it is the hand that wields the switch that rules the nation in the long run; and I remember with vivid recollection that it was the hand of woman that first impressed my own plastic hide with a ferule, to drive deep into my sub-consciousness certain other rules that have stuck by me lo, these many years, in spite of Brander Matthews' scoffing thesis on the illogical conclusions of those precepts and the temptation constantly offered by Professor Lounsbury to split the infinitive from stem to stern. Perhaps I should go even farther, and express my unlimited admiration for these Chico schoolmarms who so boldly affirm the grammarhood of the English language in defiance of the highest authorities to the contrary. It would be heartless and cruel to shatter the fond illusion that these grammarianesses of Chico hug so lovingly to their tender breasts by asking them to cite some "rule" whereby I, for specific example, may be guided in the use of that dear old verb "loved" in the imperfect participle passive. How shall I love in the progressive passive tense? I know how I do love in that form, but there's no grammar in the emotion nor is it governed by any rule. It is said that Mr. Pope, the poet, who was sufficiently master of the rules and regulations of the language to write an Essay on Criticism, once slipped up on the rules prescribing the agreement of verbs, writing full and large in one of his "Spectators," "It must be careful that it don't." Now will the wise ladies of Chico tell me what is wrong with Mr. Pope's sentence, citing rule and principle? Then, after they have told me will they kindly inform me if Mr. Pope could have defended himself under the aegis of the subjunctive mood, if such protection existed in the time of good Queen Anne? Futhermore, I have long searched for an infallible "rule" governing the use of "shall" and "will." Do the fair grammarians of Chico happen to have something of that sort in their curricula? And can these protesting Crichtons in petticoats write me a letter of thanks for my kindly remarks herein, containing accurate use of the relative pronouns "who" and "that," co-ordinating and restrictive, with rules and exceptions, informing me when "who" is best applied as a co-ordinating member and when it is frequently used as restrictive, and why "that" is now limited to its function as a proper relative of restriction. I confess that with the rules plain before me I can make nothing of them, and I am corroborated in this lemma by such authorities of "usage" as Matthew Arnold, Cardinal Newman and Walter Pater. Would the teacheresses of Chico adopt resolutions denunciatory of the "grammar" of these authorities of "the best usage" if they violated some of the "rules" prescribed in the little, narrow "grammars" of Chico? Then heaven help Carlyle with his ideas overwhelming and utterly submerging all grammars, all "usage" and all the "rules" of all the schools!

Our Virtuous Postoffice

A postoffice ban is on bridge whist. The game is to be classed with the vulgar Mexican lottery and invitations to participate in a bridge whist party will be denied the privileges of the mails if prizes are offered as the reward of luck or skill. This postoffice of ours is getting more virtuous every day. If it keeps on in the way it is going it will not be long until nothing but Dr. Rader's sermons or George Sterling's poems will be allowed governmental facilities of transportation. It will be easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for letters or a bundle of newspapers to pass through the mails. No wonder they won't give us a parcels post delivery system; they are afraid that we will use the postoffice as a freight carrying agent for faro bankers and opium smugglers. It has been decided that the postoffice department must be as far removed from reproach and suspicion as Caesar's wife ought to have been under the dictator's domestic prescription. Some venerable dodo of the Pharisee persuasion who exists down in Connecticut where the Blue Laws are live letter statutes, disgruntled because his wife and three unmarriageable daughters were not invited to a bridge party in the ultra fashionable set of the village of Nutmegville, sent a complaint to the Postmaster-General setting forth that bridge whist is a "lottery" and invitations to "parties" thereof are prohibited as mail matter under section 499 of the postal regulations which subjects violators to a fine of $500 or imprisonment for one year or both. It was a mean Yankee Puritan revenge. I hope that the old blunderbuss of self-righteousness will have to shake the dice for his own soul some day with Beelzebub with miracles and sanctification by works barred. In that event I know what will become of the snuffling ancient. He'll be appointed Postmaster-General of a postoffice department that handles only asbestos mail.

A Ducal Remedy for Love

I wonder why Romeo Montague didn't go mountain-climbing or engage himself in some other equally arduous if similarly unproductive employment, when he found that his suit for the hand of Miss Juliet Capulet was hopeless. That is what the Duke of the Abruzzi would have done if he had been Romeo; and I suppose that is what Romeo would have done if he had been the Duke of the Abruzzi. In any event that is what the Duke of the Abruzzi has done upon provocation similar to that which sent Romeo to the lean apothecary of Mantua. The Duke has decided that as he cannot marry Miss Elkins of West Virgina he will imperil a life not otherwise worth living, by climbing Mont Blanc in a season when other climbers are afraid to try it—when safe, sane and conservative persons not aflicted with unrequited love are prone to beware of the awful avalanche and to stand from under when the pine tree's withered branch threatens. Why a distracted lover should rush in where an angel of sound and disposing mind would fear to tread, is beyond my ken. I can understand wherein mountain-climbing may be a panacea for the nervous strain consequent on love denied or love defied; as I can also realize that a steady session at the woodpile might achieve the same purpose; but why not wait until the traveling is better? Why not go at it in a more popular and economical season of the year when Cook's personally conducted excursions are swarming all over the Alps? And if all we read about lovers whose biographers are poets and impassioned novel writers, if half true, a more insidious danger lurks for Abruzzi in the ambition of this mountain enterprise than were in ambush to worry Poet Longfellow's youth, who bore 'mid snow and ice a banner with the strange device, "Excelsior!" No bulletin has been published from the court physician concerning the Duke's heart action, and we are therefore unable to determine with scientific certainty whether he is physically fitted to endure the exertion necessary to accomplish the ascent of Mont Blanc. A Duke with a broken heart should be very careful how he exercises, especially after eating. If anything fatal should happen to Abruzzi in this adventure the world would probably never know it, as the dispatches inform us that he is climbing the mountain incognito. Even the guides will not know him and the coroner will be unable to "identify" him.

Larkin Enlightening Ignorance

Professor Edgar Lucien Larkin, the eminent astronomer and all-round scientist, has begun to number his answers to the unscientific ignoramuses who seek the light of his knowledge. Professor Larkin has been answering scientific conundrums during the period of an ordinary lifetime, but heretofore he has not counted his answers. It appears from revised data that he has answered cccxlix questions in the newspapers; ccix in letters to inquiring correspondents; dxiv offhand without thinking; ccccviii from memory without special research; and mdcccxvii from the data of his note books and encyclopedias. It will be observed that Professor Larkin prefers the Roman numerals to the vulgar Arabic. Anything Roman or Latin seems to fit the purpose of the modern scientist better than plain English or the Arabian formulae upon which our first scientific knowledge was based. I suppose Professor Larkin could tell us why. The Romans were merely borrowers and purveyors in everything except the science of war—like the Japanese of this generation. Their art was borrowed from Greece; their literature was an imitation of Grecian poets; and their science was a hodge podge of absurd deduction from the theories of every nation that came under their dominion. Yet Professor Larkin and the others express the terms of their various sciences in the language of the Romans, even going so far in many instances as to distort the plain language of the original into a bastard, hybrid or hermaphrodite etymology which the dictionary makers have recently begun to classify as "new Latin." In my schoolboy days we called it "hog Latin." It is a pedantic affection, of course; like writing a prescription for a cure of mumps in Latin, by a crossroads doctor who couldn't spell the ingredients of his potion in English. I will say, however, on behalf of my favorite scientists, that Professor Larkin, in his avocation of schoolmaster for the mob, does not use much Latin—not enough, indeed, to determine whether he knows the language or not. Moreover, Professor Larkin is an honest scientist. He confesses in nearly all of his communications that he is as ignorant as those who ask the questions. He endeavors to palliate this ignorance, however, by giving the inquiring ignoramus a full resume of all that his fellow scientists think they know about the matter under inquiry. That's the kind of scientist to have around the house; an easy, flexible, human scientist wholly divested of the dogmatism and dogmaolatry of his tribe; the kind that Aristophanes said Socrates was not; one that would have permitted doubt of the accuracy of the Ptolemaic theory of the sidereal universe before Copernicus settled the disputes between the warring schoolmen; and a moonshee who, even in this day is willing to allow that the nebular hypothesis is not a permanent and definite demonstration of astronomical exactitude. It is this humility of mind that commends Professor Larkin to me, and makes him my favorite scientist. It is because he knows he doesn't know that I prefer him to Professor Serviss who is top heavy with what he doesn't know and doesn't even know that; reminding me of an inverted pyramid doing a dervish dance to the music of the spheres.

Mother Sues Daughter

In the news from Oakland the other day was an item about a suit brought by Mrs. Mary A. Wandesforde, a widow, against her daughter, Ivy Wandesforde Kersey, to recover $15,000 worth of property. Few there are perhaps that will recall the history of the Wandesfordes. The husband of the plaintiff in this case was a noted portrait painter and he was among the wits of the Bohemian Club when the club was celebrated for its bohemian atmosphere. His daughter Ivy was a clever vocalist and she went on the stage and was in Camillo Urso's Company. While on a tour of the country she met Maitland Kersey, an Englishman of international reputation who, at that time, was connected with a steamship company. Kersey fell in love with the California girl and they were married with considerable pomp and circumstance. The marriage brought no happiness to the painter's daughter. Some years ago it was rumored that Kersey intended to get a divorce in order to marry Birdie Fair, who is now the wife of W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr. The Kerseys are now divorced and Mrs. Kersey is living in Haywards.

Our Shallow Universities

Now comes Dr. James P. Munroe in the Popular Science Monthly with the assertion (backed by argument and instances) that our universities are propagating mediocrity and inefficiency. That distinguished psychologist, Dr. Scripture, gave utterance to the same opinion some time ago. Dr. Scripture attributed the evil to the American incapacity for detail, whereas Dr. Munroe suspects that the trouble is due to over-specialization in the colleges. "Many a green tree of scholarship," says Dr. Munroe, "many a fair, broad field of general culture, has been converted into a naked waste of narrow pedantry." In these columns I have often commented on the failure of our institutions of higher education to realize the objects and aims of a university, but it appears that I have been conscious of only half the truth. I have known that the humanities were far from being properly cultivated in the universities; that students were getting little of that kind of mental training which is conducive to a broad outlook and freedom from every species of narrowness, but I assumed that at least in science instruction was of the highest class. But now I am told that the universities are turning out second rate physicists, second rate botanists, second rate chemists and second raters generally. "We send out from our schools of applied science," says Dr. Munroe, "many a man competent to put up a bridge, but not competent to put up a good front among his equals, wise in the handling of formulae, but ignorant in the handling of men, full of little knacks and methods of calculation, but empty of that tact and intellectual skill which are absolutely essential to professional success." Respecting much that has been said in these columns from time to time Dr. Munroe says: "Give a boy, give a student all the facts and all the practice he can get in college, provided you do not fail to give him at the same time a broad outlook upon history, upon human experience and upon human life. Whether he is to start in a store, in an office, or as a drummer; whether he is to be a minister, a lawyer, an engineer or a doctor, his success in life depends enormously upon his ability to get on with and to handle men. He cannot have that success unless he be broad, catholic, tolerant, tactful and philosophical, not as a specialist but as a man. By success is not meant, of course, mere financial and professional success—though in nine cases out of ten these are most likely to be achieved by the broadest man—but that highest success which comes through the widest social usefulness."

FOR CLEAN SIDEWALKS.
A Most Useful Ordinance Introduced by Supervisor McAllister.
SUPERVISOR McALLISTER has introduced an ordinance prohibiting the sweeping of dirt or refuse out to any sidewalk, or emptying rub- ish of any kind into the gutters, and also requiring all householders to regularly sprinkle the sidewalks in front of their premises. Similar ordinances are in force in Eastern cities, and especially ordinances requiring sidewalks to be kept clear of snow and ice have been upheld by the courts as a legitimate exercise of police power. The enforcement of one of the provisions is charged with the patrolmen on the beat. The ordinance was referred to the Police Committee. The only reason why such an ordinance should be adopted and enforced. There is no need of all cities which are inhabited by people who care nothing about neatness and cleanliness, that there will be much difficulty in enforcing such an ordinance. The people are familiar with policemen and accustomed to obey them. While trouble will be in the three first districts. Within a month all the loafers will be rounded up and go to jail if the sidewalk in front of their dwellings is not properly cleaned. Most people who occupy dwellings like these will happen to be respectable, well-behaved people, who are always glad to have a chance to do the right thing. Other kind do not generally. It is the streets and sidewalks in the poorer districts that are usually filthy. There are many vacant lots in front of houses that are never cleaned. In front of the better class residences the sidewalks are kept clean. In front of the former the sidewalks are never cleaned. On the good business streets the owners of property clean their sidewalks. On other streets some of them pay no attention to them. The community has the right to compel all occupants of property keep the side walks in front of them in decent condition. As it is, some do and some do not. The number of those who do not is sufficient to give large sections of the city a dirty appearance, and the rubbish left on their walks by the slovenly blows on to those of the cleanly class. The ordinance cannot be too stringent or too rigidly enforced.

City Ordinances Are Not Necessary to Produce Clean Sidewalks in Presidio Terrace

In other parts of the city you will find dust and papers blowing in the front door and the streets and sidewalks in a disgraceful condition. Not so in Presidio Terrace where they are kept as clean as a new pin. Lots in this beautiful residence park are selling NOW at $150 per foot. They are cheap at that price and will soon be increased. Let us show you several we have left.

THE WEEKLY FINANCIAL OUTLOOK

By R. E. Mulcahy

The past week has seen many quick changes in Wall Street security values. Several drives were made by the bears in an endeavor to dislodge stock. In every attempt complete failure resulted. There was general selling of the Guggenheim properties, causing a large extension of the already oversold condition of their securities. The attacks were mostly against American Smelting and Refining common; rumors were widely circulated unfavorable to the company's future prospects. National Lead was threatened with adverse legislation at the hands of Congress. To offset this rumor came reassurance of an increase in dividend of the common stock of this company. The general market was given over to specialities. Among the most prominent stocks of this class were Colorado Southern, Wabash, Texas Pacific, Chesapeake & Ohio and Pacific Mail. The latter sold at 40¼, declining rapidly to 37 after the President's message had been published. The friends of Pacific Mail were somewhat disappointed at the President's mild reference to the matter of subsidy; however, the decline was not taken seriously by those who gave the subject proper thought.

It is quite certain a favorable subsidy measure will pass at this season. It is absolutely necessary to protect American shipping. Many realize this fact now who were heretofore antagonistic to the measure.

The general upward movement seen in the Gould Stocks was quite significant. There has been of late very urgent demand for Western Pacific Bonds, as well as a strong inquiry for the common stock.

The Steel Stocks have shown renewed activity. I learn from a most reliable source the United States Steel Company has within the last two weeks booked the largest orders in the history of the company. Tariff legislation threatened does not seem to worry stockholders to any material extent. Nothing of a serious nature is anticipated in the way of reductions.

The Lead Trust may have some adverse legislation to contend with. The rapidity with which new bond issues are subscribed for is one of the favorable signs of the times. Some gold has recently been shipped abroad, but this has no particular significance, and the market gave it only passing notice. More could be spared without interfering with money rates on this side. The demand for our farm products by European Countries is becoming quite urgent. Already seventy million bushels of wheat have been exported from this year's crop to the United Kingdom and the continent. Our corn and barley is in good demand for European consumption, and at remarkably high prices. This will soon turn the tide of gold shipments back to this country again. The Government report issued on the acreage and condition of winter wheat, sown in this country, places the condition equal to a general average, and the acreage about thirty millions, showing a most favorable condition for the coming crops.

The cotton crop will probably be 13,000,000 bales (500 pounds to the bale) against 9,000,000 bales seven years ago, showing the gain in production during that period. Cotton is the cheapest farm product in the American market. The low price of cotton may be accounted for from the fact that legislation throughout the Southern States was enacted, forbidding the trading in futures. This resulted in forcing the producers and bankers to carry the crop. The load has been found to be too heavy. Many of the Southern States are thinking seriously of repealing the laws forbidding the trading in futures. If the same laws were enacted in our wheat and corn growing States, the price of these cereals would decline below the cost of producing. It takes more than the farmer and banker to carry from one harvest to another our great farm productions.

Trading in futures may have its abuses; nevertheless, it is a commercial necessity. Markets will adjust themselves to a supply and demand basis. Traders in our market centers are alive at all times to true conditions. No set of men or speculators can control the markets of the world in cereals, such as corn, oats, wheat and cotton. It is absolutely necessary that market centers should be maintained to regulate prices. As for America, unless conditions change materially, we shall have little or no wheat for export within a period of ten years. Our production is not increasing as rapidly as our consumption. Something must be done to increase our wheat raising.

We are now within twenty days of the period when over three hundred millions of dollars will be put into circulation. This will have more than a passing effect. I believe we are on the verge of one of the biggest bull stock markets this country has ever witnessed. The better class of stocks will soar to a point where investors will not realize more than four per cent, but they will have a speculative prospect in addition to their actual earning power. Such stocks as Union Pacific, Great Northern, Northern Pacific, St. Paul and many others of this class will join the investment list and be out of the reach of speculators. Speculation will be confined to the small railway properties, and the industrial list. Bankers will be forced to regard the industrial properties with more favor from a collateral point of view, or keep their funds in idleness.

Money rates promise to be low for a long time to come, this of itself means higher stock and bond prices. It would not be surprising to see an advance of five to ten dollars per share in the good stocks before the middle of January. Values would not then be high when all conditions are considered.

Social Prattle

By TANTALUS

A Premiere Event

Much has been written and much more has been gossiped of the ball and banquet given by Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott to five hundred and twenty intimate friends at the St. Francis last week. Especial note has been made by the newspaper folk of the price that was paid for the entertainment; there was singular unanimity of the figures published, and some of those not in the know wondered how the reporters learned that it cost the Scotts $10,000 to provide a "social event" surpassing the traditional functions of the Donohoes and Hopkinses. Without hinting the slightest derogation of this premiere assembly of San Francisco's beauty and fashion, it may be said that its cost is only relatively extraordinary. This city is still young in its social aspiration; it has scarcely donned its dinner dress and its ballroom robes. When it shall be fully rehabilitated and radiant with renewed hope of a brighter future than it has never known, a ten thousand dollar entertainment will look small indeed. Real opulence and genuine sumptuousness will mark the social ambitions of San Francisco's future millionaires; and some of those who were sleeping the sleep of innocence while their mothers were dancing at the Scotts' ball will live to dance at balls to rival in splendor and cost those that spread the fame of the Bradley-Martins to the uttermost and the nethermost parts of the earth. The gossiping peris outside the gilded pale have been complaining of the money wasted on this one-night festivity; but the moan is vain; not one dollar was wasted; Mr. Scott's money was distributed where it will do more good than it is likely to do if it is kept in escrow for Mr. Scott's heirs. This money is in circulation among those who will pour it into the channels of the retail trade of this city. That is the way to look upon these affairs. Let us have as much of Mr. Scott's money as he desires to give us; and if the pleasure of giving is enhanced by such display as he has made in this instance who shall say him nay? None, we dare affirm, but sordid churls and small souled acolytes swinging cheap incense at the altar of Mammon.

Not Greenway's Wine

More significant than the price that Mr. Scott paid for his fun, is the label on the wine his guest drank at the banquet. What do you think? It was not Mumm—it was Moet and Chandon, Imperial Crown, (Brut). That announcement almost deserves an exclamation point at its conclusion. Moet and Chandon! Imperial, too! And wearing a crown! Not sec, but brut! Does this mean the passing of Mumm? Is another vintage casting its bubbled sweetness upon lips that loved the other, the older, the wine of Greenway? Is Mumm passe? Is Moet and Chandon the latest debutante? If so, why? There's the rub. If Moet and Chandon has come to stay, then Mumm is gone to remain. The substitution was certainly not accidental, and therein lies its significance in the opinion of those who are watching the star of Ned Greenway's social destiny. There are some who say that as his wine flows so flows the tide of Greenway's popularity. Both have long been at flood. Are both now on the ebb? Let us await the answer in the wine order for the next millionaire function.

Setting the Pace

The town is familiar with all the details of this much-talked-of affair. We know who was the most beautiful woman on the floor; who wore the most expensive dress; which of the gowns were imported and which were not; why some of the guests were invited and why some who thought they would be invited were omitted from the list; all these things are known and some of them disputed over the tea urn and across the bridge table. Further than this perhaps it is only proper to say that the Scott ball is a rubriced page in the social history of San Francisco. It will be the basis of comparison for future entertainments of similar character. And it will be a long time before that comparison will relegate the Scott function to the second degree. Merely for the benefit of posterity and for the insurance of reliable tradition it should be here recorded that of the many beautiful women at the ball none was more beautiful than Mrs. Scott herself in her yellow and gold satin gown; also, that among the younger matrons Mrs. Clement Tobin and Mrs. Walter Hobart won distinction, while Mary Keeney was voted the prettiest of the girls. Incidentally it is worthy of mention that the gala affair lasted until nearly half after seven in the morning, a decidedly pleasant innovation being the serving of breakfast at six o'clock to the same partners that had enjoyed the supper. It was not until after their morning meal that society went home to bed.

The Lion of the Season

San Francisco society is never without a lion, and usually he is a foreigner with a title. The lion of this season is Count d' Aubans, the gallant young Frenchman who ruffled the feathers of the Sons of the American Revolution on the occasion of a banquet in Oakland. The Count is from Paris, where he formed the acquaintance of several Californians who pronounce him the "real thing" in French aristocracy. As the Count is unattached, and as nobody knows of any business interests that are engaging his attention in this part of the world, the supposition is that he has come hither in search of a wife. This is the supposition that always find favors in such cases, and of course it is accompanied by the inference that the titled hero would not draw the line at a girl merely because she had a fortune. However, in the case of Count d' Aubans it is said that he has already lost his heart to a charming debutante, and that she is not an heiress. And by the way she is not the debutante who monopolized the Count's attentions at the Greenway birthday dance.

A concert by the Sequoia Club, under the direction of Dr. H. J. Stewart, will take place at the club rooms on Tuesday evening, December 15th.

Society Apprehensive

Over the border in San Mateo County there is a miniature Monte Carlo which is frequented, I am told, by many of our gay society folk who live down the peninsula. It is said that some of the most exclusive representatives of our provincial aristocracy have played roulette there, and that some of them are now in a state of dread induced by the prospect of being summoned into court to testify in a will contest, the issues of which involve matters that had their origin in the gambling resort.

The Conversation Dragged

At the recent farewell dinner given by the Peter Martins conversations was not as brisk as it usually is at such affairs. Conversation is not one of the arts cultivated by our provinical aristocracy with a view to edification; one rarely hears an epigram at a social function, or for that matter anything that indicates a capacity for intellectual delight, but of small talk on commonplace topics there is no dearth. Yet the conversation dragged at the Martin dinner. Why? An explanation is not easy. It would be absurd, of course, to attribute the dullness of the evening to the circumstance that Mrs. Martin was escorted into dinner by Henry T. Scott and that Rudolph Spreckels was placed at her left. Mrs. Martin, by the way, wore nothing sensational that evening. I hear that she will not wear an evening gown that was not made abroad and as she has not been abroad for a year she has exhausted her wardrobe and consequently appeared at the dinner in a gown with which the guests were not unfamiliar.

The Hammond-Burnett Wedding

The wedding of Grace Hammond and Wellbore Burnett is to be marked with the usual elegant simplicity characteristic of the Hammond family. Hammond pere is a man of wealth and distinguished for his liberality, but he has always abhorred the custom of entertaining for the benefit of society reporters. The beautiful Hammond home on Broadway has been the scene of no elaborate social functions, but there has been much entertaining in the way of informal dinners and afternoon receptions, which usually end in a motor trip.

The Greenway

Leaders may come and leaders may go but the Greenway runs on forever. And the Czar will hold forth as usual at the Fairmont this Friday night as the presiding genius of one of the dances for which he is justly famous. As it will be on the heels of the Scott ball you may depend on it that Greenway will do his prettiest, and—whisper it not in Gath!—there is to be a great rally of the popular leader's friends on this occasion. After the last Greenway it was said that there was a scarcity of dancing men. This time there will be a plethora. There is nobody that has greater success in rounding up dancing men than Greenway when he half tries and as for girls—of course the girl that doesn't attend a Greenway is not of the elect. Early in the week I heard that arrangements were being made for a number of dinner parties to precede the Greenway ball. It is now quite the thing to take rooms at the Fairmont on a Greenway dance and dinner parties are of course quite numerous. Among the more formal and elaborate of the dinner parties arranged for this week is one to be given by the J. C. Wilsons. They will have forty guests. Among others who are planning to entertain the same evening are Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Gallois, Thornwell Mullaly and Mrs. Frederick Sharon.

A Theatre for San Rafael

From San Rafael comes the news that young Frank Johnson is about to engage in a theatrical enterprise. If his plans are carried out the people of Marin County will acclaim him a great public benefactor. There is nothing that this growing suburban town needs more than a theatre, and this is the long felt want which Mr. Johnson purposes filling. It is reported that he intends spending sixty thousand dollars on a building which is to be one of the finest temples of the drama in the State. Johnson is a hustler, and he has the money to carry out his designs. He also has a good deal of surplus energy as was made evident two summers ago when he revived interest in and taste for the succulent shirmp, a market for which he created in San Rafael.

Aristocratic Frogs To Be Raised

In a city so noted as San Francisco is for its epicures it is singular that the frog breeding industry has been neglected. Especially singular is it in view of the fact that conditions on this peninsula are most favorable to the propagation of batrachians. One of the reasons, I am told, why the frog has received very little encouragement here from breeders is that San Francisco palate has not been educated up to a taste for the delicate meat. But this is a matter that is to be attended to. From the direction of Burlingame comes the news that Mr. Leon de Sabla is to embark in the business of breeding frogs on his ten acre tract near Woodside. He has a fine vineyard on this land, and he is now constructing two large reservoirs which are to be dedicated to the propagation of frogs of the finest quality.

The Hamlin Coterie

About sixty of the young married people have held dances every two weeks during the winter for the last few years at Miss Hamlin's school. These are very informal affairs, but those fortunate enough to belong to the congenial coterie always enjoy a rollicking unconventional time. Only two single girls belong—Florence Ives and Alida Ghirardelli, and amongst the attractive young matrons and their husbands who are leading spirits at these delightful little functions are Mr. and Mrs. Harry Sears Bates, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Hart, Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Chenery, Mr. and Mrs. T. Carey Friedlander, and Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Howell.

A Question of Title

Something new in titular nomenclature was sprung at the St. Francis Hotel the other day when the son of Baron J. H. von Schroeder registered as "Baron J. H. von Schroeder, Jr." I have been asked to decide the question whether there can be a junior baron during the lifetime of the father from whom the son is to inherit his title. I am not an authority on questions of this kind, but I should say offhand that the "Jr" on the St. Francis register is misleading and inaccurate. And while I am not familiar with German custom I am under the impression that members of the nobility are not in the habit of affixing their titles to their Christian and surnames. But after all why cavil about such matters in this country? Any old thing goes. The wife of Captain Jones signs herself "Mrs. Captain Jones," and Colonel Bluebottle of Kentucky and his title are as inseparable as the Colonel and his bowie-knife. Even the Grand Exalted Ruler of the Bluejays loves to parade his title on all occasions. Young von Schroeder, by the way, returned but a short time ago from England where he was engaged in the study of the banking business. He is said to have exhibited considerable ability and that he gives promise of big achievement.

To Wed in February

The wedding of Miss Ethel Hartson, daughter of N. Hartson of St. Helana, and Captain Caldwell Turner of the U. S. Marine Corps has been set for early in February. Captain Turner is the son of the late William Turner and grandson of Admiral Turner. Miss Hartson's mother was the beautiful Nannie Gluyas, daughter of Captain Gluyas of St. Helena, and sister of Mrs. Robert Williams. They were among the most brilliant and accomplished women in California society in the early days.

Mrs. Mansfeldt's Distant Journey

Mrs. Hugo Mansfeldt will leave immediately after the holidays for a tour in Northern Africa, visiting Algiers and Tunis. Mrs. Mansfeldt will remain in Algiers until May when she will go to Italy where she will be joined by Mr. Mansfeldt, and together they will travel leisurely through Europe during the summer. Mr. Mansfeldt will return to his pupils next winter, and Mrs. Mansfeldt will go back to Northern Africa where she will sojourn for several months. The Mansfeldts are among the most popular of the cultured society of this city, their musical ability commending them everywhere and their taste and refinement in all matters of art and literature giving them precedence in all their relations with the social activities of San Francisco. Mrs. Mansfeldt's main purpose in going abroad is to obtain a complete rest as well as change of scene, having lately experienced some trouble with her nerves.

A Wedding Episode

An amusing contretemps occurred at the de Young-Cameron wedding during Archbishop Riordan's remarks on the subject of marriage. The Archbishop gave utterance to the sentiment that men and women should marry early in life, and as he did so one of the family guests, a prominent representative of the smart set, interrupted with a rather curious ejaculation that startled the speaker. Whether the lady intended to sound a note of dissent or had merely uttered herself in a moment of abstraction is a question that has provoked much discussion. The Archbishop himself is said to have been puzzled by the episode. One thing is certain he intended no personal allusion.

Anna Weller, and even if the bars were let down a little, and a few not of the exclusive inner circle were present, it was pronounced by many the jolliest of the winter's receptions. The army set was there in full force, the uniforms making a pleasing contrast not often enough seen at our big functions. Even those who were fortunate enough to be present at the launching of the Prometheus managed to be back in time to run in for a few minutes. The refreshments were distinctly reminiscent of the south of Mason and Dixon line hospitality, not just the conventional salad and ice, but a very bountiful Southern spread such as Mrs. McMullin was used to in her girlhood days in Alabama. The McMullins belong to the Southern set so prominent here a decade ago. To this set also belong the Maynards, the Gwins, the Ashes, the Selbys, the Eyres, the Boardmans and a score or more of others. Mrs. McMullin's two grand daughters are very charming girls and bid fair to be extremely popular.

Will Tour Europe

Mrs. Henry T. Scott and Mrs. Joseph B. Crockett will leave early in January for their tour abroad. In Paris they will be joined by Mrs. Russell Wilson with whom they will tour the continent. Mrs. Wilson will return to San Francisco in the spring. Mrs. Miller, formerly Gertie Benchley, had intended to join Mrs. Wilson and travel with her, but owing to the serious illness of her daughter she had to cut short her stay in Paris, leaving Mrs. Wilson alone among strangers, as it were. But later she was joined by Miss Kline who will remain with her until the arrival of Mrs. Scott and Mrs. Crockett.

A Young Heir Engaged

Rumors of another engagement is in the air. This time I am assured the announcement is shortly to be made as the girl herself has already confessed. She is a demi-brunette of an attractive girlish type, who made her debut last year, and her fiance, they say is some three years her junior. He is a nice young fellow, only nineteen, and quite wealthy in his own right, or rather, he will be when he becomes of age. His grandmother is a very rich woman, having some two or three millions in her own name. Whether or not she approves of the match I have not heard.

Dolls on Parade

One of the prettiest events recorded with this history of the past week's doings across the bay, was that of the "Doll Show," given by the members of the Ebel Club for the benefit of the West Oakland home for boys and girls. To Mrs. I. A. Beretta is due much of the credit for the great success of the affair. At all turns the fair manager proved herself capable and created no little comment when she conceived the idea of giving the prize dollies a ride through Oakland in her new 40 horsepower Studebaker touring car. The daintily and expensively gowned dolls were seated, literally, "all over" the machine and this bevy of beauties formed a highly pleasing contrast to the rich black and brilliant red of Mrs. Beretta's auto. Nor did Mrs. Beretta overlook the possibilities of her "stunt." Upon the return to the club headquarters from the morning spin the newspaper photographers were on hand.

Mrs. Dunsmuir of Victoria, formerly Maud Shoobert of Sausalito, is visiting her mother.

Bonifaces Banqueted

The members of the Hotelmen's Association were the guests last Wednesday night of Percy L. Pettigrew, proprietor of the Victoria. There was a business meeting the early part of the evening in the American dining room, after which supper was served in the banquet hall. Although informal, the supper was not lacking in the simple elegance and good taste that have characterized all affairs at the Victoria. A menu of dainties was served under the direction of Justin Lodagnous, whom the management of the hotel has been fortunate in securing as steward. It was Monsieur Lodagnous who opened the old Maison Riche and made the place famous. Mr. Pettigrew, who made a genial host, was assisted by E. S. de Wolf of the Granada.

The vaudeville entertainment given last Saturday in the Colonial Ball Room of the St Francis by the Daughters of the American Revolution proved to be an unprecedented success and established the popularity of the vaudeville idea socially, which was originally given a vogue by the unique affair held in the St. Francis some time ago by the Daughters of the Confederacy. The Colonial Ball Room, however, lent a setting to the decorations, gowns and quaint Colonial costumes last Saturday that made the event one of the prettiest of the season.

INTERIOR DECORATORS BUSH AT VAN NESS

James and Ibsen

By Theodore Bonnet

That Mr. Louis James has more courage than discretion is evident from what he is doing at the Van Ness Theatre. At this playhouse he is to be seen making a tremendous effort to render Peer Gynt acceptable to theatregoers. Now courage is a most praiseworthy quality but when it is distinctly quixotic to me it is tragic rather than amusing. Cervantes to the contrary notwithstanding, a brave man earnestly fighting a windmill I regard as a most lamentable figure. James's courage is especially deplorable because he is held entirely responsible for its futility. No Ibsen enthusiast would be so charitable to Mr. James as to admit that Peer Gynt is not a playable play, and therefore the actor that fails in it must suffer the consequences of his folly. Yet as a matter of fact, while this drama, judged merely as a work of the imagination, is perhaps the greatest masterpiece of the great Norwegian's poetic genius, a complete and successful representation of it on the stage, except perhaps under conditions similar to those that contribute to the impressiveness of a Parsifal performance at Bayreuth, is hardly possible. In this play Ibsen is more poetic than dramatic. He attempts to drive home some philosophic truths through a combination of fantasy and realism, but failing to clothe his central motive with striking circumstances his theme bores in its interminable evolution, and he neither captivates us with his grotesqueries nor moves us with his human passions. He created a powerful, vivid personality, through which with grim humor he rails at egoism and preaches the unimportance of the struggle for self-realization; he works out in dramatic form a psychological treatise that affords in the reading much intellectual delight, but perfect enjoyment of it is not to be had in the theatre, the reason being that a tedious multiplicity of details is employed in the development of the basic idea. Peer, we are told by Ibsen's most ardent admirers, is one of the greatest heroes of the stage, ranking in their opinion with Hamlet and Faust. Unquestionably he is a striking, unique, personality. And perhaps the spell of him is enduring. He is a lovable scamp despite his selfishness, his waywardness and his rascalities, but he doesn't grip you at any stage of the proceedings. You accompany him through his whole life, but you are never very deeply concerned with his affairs. Until the remote, long delayed wind-up he does nothing more than amuse. The profound truths which he serves to exemplify through the veil of fantastic symbolism are impressive enough, but the method of their inculcation appeals only to the esthetic side of our nature without ever quite illuding us, without evoking any very agreeable sensations, or stirring any deep emotions. It will be said of course that the esthetic appeal ought to be sufficient for any man with a soul and with spiritual insight, but there are not many of us sufficiently highbrowed to be able to feast on the symbolism of Peer Gynt for four hours at a stretch; not at any rate in a production having, despite some spectacular effects, so few adventitious aids as the one at the Van Ness. Poetic fancy is the principal element of this play. It enters the domain of the grotesque and to be in any degree effective, to produce the desired sensations, it must have something more than Grieg music and such illusions as are produced by the electrician and the ordinary stage mechanic. By steeping an audience in the atmosphere essential to the perfect representation of this play the senses would doubtless be rendered susceptible to the esthetic appeal, but the fact is not to be lost sight of that in the pursuit of the subtle psychological study to which Ibsen devoted himself in this play he failed to sustain interest in the development of his theme. If he was not guilty of a fatal technical transgression in failing to effect compactness of plot, at least he did not give sufficient color and vitality to the progressive episodes. To be sure it is quite possible that for theatrical purposes the play is much superior to what it appears to be in the hands of Mr. Louis James, whose conception of Peer Gynt is a cross between his conception of Brutus and his conception of the fool in Francesca da Rimini. High histrionic power and imaginative genius are required to vitalize the role of Peer Gynt. Mr. James has considerable histrionic power, but he has not much imagination. He has some art, but it is not the art of sincerity. His conception of acting is that it depends entirely on technique. Consequently his emotion never springs out of himself. He works it off like an athlete reducing his flesh. In this Ibsen play Mr. James remains uninterestingly aside from what he is doing. He fails utterly to absorb and radiate the poetry of it. He merely acts and acts only to act again. There are many things that Mr. James can do well but Ibsen is not one of them. I doubt whether in all his experience as an actor Mr. James ever came so far from realizing the spirit of a scene as he does in the fantastic driving episode at the deathbed of Peer Gynt's mother.

"The Lion and The Mouse"

Charles Klein's popular drama, "The Lion and The Mouse," comes to the Van Ness Monday night for a two weeks' run. The play will be presented by Henry B. Harris's excellent company which has been highly praised by critics in all sections of the country. The play is one of more than ephemeral interest as evidenced from the fact that it is now in its third season.

The Nordica Concerts

This coming Sunday afternoon, December 13th, at the Van Ness Theatre, Mme. Lillian Nordica will give her opening concert and from all indications this great artist will receive a typical California welcome. There is no singer who holds a warmer spot in the hearts of the music lovers of San Francisco than this brilliant American woman who has won her way from the ranks of the choir singers to a foremost position in the world of art. Although accompanied by two splendid assisting artists, Miss Emma Showers, pianiste, and Frederick Hastings, baritone, Mme. Nordica carries the burden of her concerts singing no less than fourteen splendid numbers, including the great "Curse" from "Tristan und Isolde," Schubert's "Der Erlkonig" and songs by Strauss, Tschaikowsky, Leoncovallo, Faure, Hammond, Van Der Stucken and other masters. These songs will be sung in English, French, Italian and German as originally written. The second concert will be given Sunday afternoon, December 20th, when an equally interesting program will be given by Mme. Nordica, the features of which will be the tragic aria from "The Death of Jean d'Arc and Schubert's "Die Almacht." The program for Mme. Nordica's Oakland concert which is to be given next Tuesday night at Ye Liberty Playhouse, will also be an interesting one and will contain quite a few works not given at her San Francisco concerts. This promises to be the musical and social event of Oakland's winter season. Seats are on sale at the theatre box office.

A Drama of Mystery

No drama made from a novel has been translated to the stage with more ability or more success than "The House of a Thousand Candles," which is to be the Alcazar's offering next week. If you enjoy the kind of mystery that abounds in a good detective story you will enjoy this dramatization of Meredith Nicholson's famous "best seller." It contains many effective theatrical moments. The actions of the play takes place at Glenarm House, Annandale, Indiana, during the late summer. From this mansion old John Glenarm secretly departs, leaving the impression that he is dead, that he may the better learn what sort of men are Pickering, the executor of his estate, and John Glenarm, his grandson and possible heir, and, if the thing be possible, to bring about a marriage between the young man and Marian Devereux, the alternate heir. He confides his plans to Bates, the butler, the serving man who is "too good a servant tó be one," and pledges Bates to secrecy. Things might have gone smoothly enough had it not been that old Glenarm left behind him a strange and unusual will with clauses and provisions therein as whimsical as the old man's fancy, and, as executor of it, a certain Pickering. Upon the testament turns the story. Pickering and Glenarm both conclude that a hidden treasure lies concealed in some mysterious passage of the mysterious mansion, and both institute search. Glenarm, however, falls in love with Marian and asks her to be his wife. Though he has been led to believe that Marian is not Marian, but Gladys Olivia Armstrong, he has nevertheless violated by his proposal an important provision of the will, and the estate, according to its terms, reverts to the girl. This in itself would make small difference—the fortune would be in the family in any event, as it were—but, unfortunately, Pickering does not die so easily. He, with the assistance of coincidences and circumstances, convinces Glenarm that Marian has wilfully deceived him that she might obtain the hidden treasure and the House of a Thousand Candles and bestow them, with her hand, upon the villain himself and not upon the impetuous and impulsive young man who has dropped so suddenly into the Glenarm preserve. But young Glenarm refuses to vacate the premises. He is convinced that Pickering has some ulterior motive in desiring immediate possession of the estate—which he has—and he defies Pickering's hireling sheriff and Pickering's hireling assassin, Morgan, and, with his friends Donovan, and the Rev. Mr. Stoddard, and Bates, the butler and man of mystery, barricades the doors and prepares for a siege. Into the midst of these belligerent preparations comes Marian through a secret corridor, to warm Glenarm of his peril. Pickering suspects her mission and follows and, unluckily for him, brings up short in the enemy's camp. Morgan and the sheriff attack with a mob and a wild bullet, thudding against a panel, betrays by its sound the hiding place of old Glenarm's treasure. Glenarm and his friends make a hasty examination and they find that Pickering has borrowed $300,000 from the senior Glenarm and gives his notes therefore. These are due and Pickering cannot pay—hence his desperate efforts to gain possession of them. While the battle is at its height, old Glenarm himself appears as from the grave, brought to the scene by a dispatch from Bates and guided by Marian to the library, where the conflict rages, through a secret passage. The surprise is complete and the effect on besiegers alike astounding. The attack comes to an end. Pickering and Morgan are made prisoners, and, in the explanations that follow it develops that Bates is not Bates, but a man by the name of Creighton, who, to shield the father of Marian from the penalty of a forgery, assumed the crime himself, fled to America, and, answering an advertisement, found himself in the employ of the eccentric architect of "The House of a Thousand Candles.

NORDICA

Who will appear at the Van Ness Theatre, Sunday Afternoon, December 13-20 Oakland. Tuesday Evening, December 15th.

Figman's Substitute

"The Substitute," played by Max Figman at the American this week, is what the word implies for it certainly is a substitute for a good play. Max Figman is a clever comedian and ranks with the best but the play he selected to star in this year is very inferior to "The Man on the Box," the one we so kindly remembered him in last year. It is absolutely devoid of wit and snap and though he struggles to make the best of a poor play and a poorer company his efforts are almost futile. His leading lady is Miss Lolita Robertson, formerly of this city; she was the ingenue of the old Alhambra theatre. Ashton Stevens predicted she would see Broadway during her stage career. She is a most charming vivacious young lady but was cast as the demure and devout young daughter of a minister and had no opportunity to show what she could do other than play hymns and shed copious tears. This is Miss Robertson's first visit to her native city since she left.

The Lyric Hall "Pop" Concerts

From an educational standpoint the most interesting concerts of the season will be the chamber music "pops" to be given Sunday afternoons at monthly intervals at Lyric Hall by the "Lyric String Quartette" under the management of Will L. Greenbaum. This form of music is the purest of all and is the foundation of the entire orchestra, and the greatest composers the world has ever known, have done their most beautiful work in this class of compositions. These concerts are not given for financial gain but out of pure love for the art, the four members of the organization and Mr. Greenbaum giving their services without any fee until such a time as the Lyric Quartette is firmly established as a permanent musical organization of this city. Mr. Greenbaum assumes any losses that may be suffered. The prices therefore are so low that every music lover can afford to attend, the rates being $2.50 and $1.50 for the entire course of four concerts. The assisting artists thus far engaged are Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt, Miss Therese Ehrman, Mr. Eugene Blanchard and Mr. Gyula Ormay, pianists, and Lawrence H. Strauss, tenor. Seats may be ordered by writing or phoning to Mr. Greenbaum at Lyric Hall. For single concerts the prices will be 50 cents and $1.00.

At the Princess

Kolb and Dill continue to crowd the Princess Theatre at every performance with the delightful musical eccentricity, "Weiner and Schnitzel." The popularity of this piece seems to gain with every performance and never have the favorite comedians had a better vehicle for the display of their comic talents. The production is an elaborate and complete one, and principals, orchestra and chorus vie with each other in their efforts to excel. Next week will be the third of "Weiner and Schnitzel" which will be immediately succeeded by a new musical farce, entitled "The Politicians," which will exhibit Kolb and Dill in roles entirely different to those they have appeared in, but equally as funny.

An Emotional Industrial Drama

The last performances of "Zira," which has made such an unqualified hit at the Valencia Theatre, will take place Sunday afternoon and evening, and on Monday night "The Lost Paradise," adapted from the German of Ludwig Fulda by Henry C. DeMille, will receive an elaborate production. The story of "The Lost Paradise," for all that it was written in Germany more than a quarter of a century ago, is in reality a true portrayal of the spirit which fires the souls of workingmen and capitalists today. Reuben Warner, superintendent of the Knowlton Iron Works, is the acknowledged leader of the men of the mill and from boyhood has worked his way up to the most responsible position in the great factory. All this time he has nursed a deep and reverent love for Margaret Knowlton, daughter of the millionaire mill owner, but when he declares his passion, the girl reared in luxury and taught that her station in life is far above that of her father's employees, rejects him with scorn and tells him that he is only a workingman. Warner, however, discoveres that Knowlton has made his fortune out of the profits of an invention which he himself had devised years before and with the proofs at hand with which he could brand the millionaire as a thief and make himself the possessor of all his wealth, instead he destroys the evidence and saves Margaret from the shame of her father's crime. Meantime a strike is declared in the works and the millionaire appeals to the superintendent to pursuade the men to work at their old wages, but Warner refuses and reminding Margaret that she herself had taught him his place, he declares that he will go back to his old people, the workingmen, and stay with them until his employer is willing to make terms by which the mill hands can live and support their families. Knowlton finally gives in, Warner triumphs, Margaret sees the error of the teachings she has heeded so long and the "Paradise" which the superintendent thought he had lost is found again. In the adaptation of the play the action takes place near Boston, the first and third acts being in the home of the Knowltons and the second in the room of the superintendent at the works, where some striking mechanical effects are shown. In "The Lost Paradise" Robert Warwick, as the dominating superintendent, will please his many admirers in the numerous strong scenes with which the role abounds. Miss Blanche Stoddard as Margaret, "the pearl of the works," a part which she played on Broadway with great success, promises to surprise her most ardent admirers and show her wonderful versatility.

MISS EVA TAYLOR

The distinguished actress who will appear in the farcical comedy "Chums" next week at the Orpheum.

Orpheum Vaudeville

The Orpheum program for next week has a most alluring lot of features and there is every indication that those who patronize this popular vaudeville theatre will have a particularly good time. The headline attraction will be Miss Eva Taylor, a remarkably talented actress and a very beautiful woman who has to her credit several great New York dramatic successes. She will, by consent of Charles Frohman, present the successful comedy, "Chums," which ran for fourteen consecutive weeks in New York and met with unstinted praise from both press and public. Miss Taylor will have excellent support in Lawrence Grattan, Louis Albion and Eleanor Pierson. Bill Gaston and Ethel Green, whose success of about a year ago is fresh in the public memory, are sure of a cordial greeting. Their contribution will consist of a one act Nell Brinkley creation, called "Spoonyville," which enables Miss Green to present the sweetest Betty imaginable and Mr. Green to excel in a style of comedy which is peculiarly his own. The Four Franklins, a recent importation of the Orpheum Circuit, will make their first appearance in this city and present their sensational flying aerial novelty, which created quite a furore in the capitals of the old world. Carrie Clarke Ward, whose popularity and ability are on a par, both being great, will appear as "The Cook Lady" in the screaming farce of that title written for her by Sedley Brown. She will be supported by an admirable company. Next week will be the last of Harry Tate's English Company, The Italian and Majestic Trios, and of Gus Edwards' Blonde Typewriters and Arthur Conrad. A new series of Motion Pictures will be an interesting finale to the performance.

Miss Melville as "Sis Hopkins"

There are few plays which, by reason of merit alone, can be accepted as standard; there are few others that have that heart interest which is so necessary to brilliant dramatic success. "Sis Hopkins," which comes to the American Theatre for an engagement of one week beginning Sunday matinee, is now being played for the tenth season, and there are no signs of popularity waning. The sweet sentiment of the story, the home-like and natural world of the characters concerned in the telling of the tale of life and love and disappointments and ultimate triumph of the quaint country girl, "Sis Hopkins," combined with the rare art of Miss Melville as an actress, have made "Sis Hopkins" one of the most brilliant and successful comedy dramas of two decades. As the odd country girl, who has never been outside of Posey County in her life, and who believed that all the world is as true and honest to high ideals as the homely people with whom she has been associated all her days, Miss Melville is said to attain lofty dramatic heights. As she sweeps through the acts, dominating every scene, developing the sweet sentiment which is characteristic of the piece, and touching lightly the chords in pathetic moments, all sense of her awkwardness, her oddity and her quaint costume is lost, and there remains only admiration for the actress who so subtly sways her audience, and pity for the stage girl in her bitter disappointments. Miss Melville has supporting her this season a company of exceptional merit and her manager, Mr. J. R. Stirling, has given the play an entirely new scenic dressing.

E. H. Sothern will be seen at the Van Ness Theatre in January.

Klaw and Erlanger's big production of the biblical drama, "Ben Hur," will be the attraction at the Van Ness, commencing Monday, December 28th.

"The Unforseen," which will follow "The Lost Paradise" at the Valencia Theatre, is one of the greatest successes of Captain R. H. Marshall, author of "His Excellency, the Governor," and other dramatic achievements and has never been seen before in San Francisco. Charles Frohman first staged it in this country at the Empire Theatre, with Margaret Anglin, Charles Richman, Fritz Williams and other notables in the cast.

"The College Widow," George Ade's evergreen comedy, has been secured by the Valencia Theatre management for the holiday attraction at this popular playhouse and will be produced for the first time in San Francisco by a stock company.

"The Wolf," by the author of "Paid in Full," has been booked for an early date at the Van Ness Theatre. It is pronounced as great a play as "Paid in Full."

"Prince Hagen," a four act drama by Upton Sinclair, author of "The Jungle," will receive its first production on any stage under his personal supervision at the Valencia Theatre immediately following "The College Widow." Those who have been fortunate enough to read the manuscript say that the dramatic possibilities of the piece are illimitable. The opening scene, taking place in the bowels of the earth, will be staged on a most elaborate scale.

The Humanitarian and the Plovers' Eggs

Tom Tuck, while out once walking, found
Four Plover's Eggs upon the Ground,
In a slight Cavity depressed,
Which constitutes the Lapwing's Nest.
  Now Tom, he was the Class of Man
That's called humanitarian—
Whose Principles, in Word at least,
Forbade to harm or Bird or Beast,
And all Unkindness to eschew
Towards Aught that ran, or swam, or flew.
Yet he, an Epicure, adored
The Pleasures of the festal Board,
And Naught his Palate's Sense—i' Fegs—
Tickled so much as Plover's Eggs.
  Hence raged in him a dubious Fight
'Twixt Principle and Appetite,
As stood he, rooted to the Spot,
Debating an he should or not.
The Fight went on, until appeared
A sudden Light. Tom's Visage cleared.
  "Tut! Birds can't count. No Odds 'twill make
If just one Egg, unseen, I take.
The Hen won't know, so can't be pained;
While I a nice Bonne Bouche have gained."
  Quick stooped he down, one Egg he took,
Then turned as if to sling his Hook,
But, halting still, his Thoughts addressed
Once more to that terranean Nest.
  "Since Birds can't count—now I've begun,
As well," he cried, "take two as one."
  He stooped, a second Egg he took,
And turned again to sling his Hook.
But no! His Wish still kept his Legs
Close to those twain remaining Eggs.
  "Dash it! If Birds can't count," said he,
"She'll never know if I take three."
  So down he stooped, a third Egg took,
And turned, once more, to sling his Hook.
But no! Still lingered fond his Eyes Upon that one remaining Prize.
  "And if it's hatched—poor Thing," said he,
"Just think how lonely it will be.
Leave it thus lorn? Kind Heaven forbid!
I'll take it too."
  And so he did.

Auto Notes

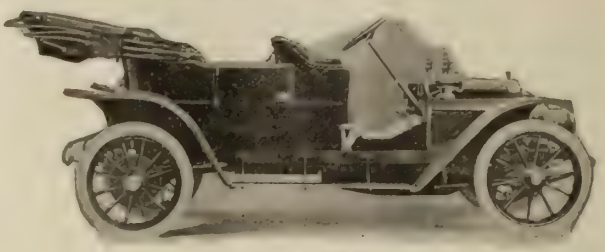
W. E. Stokes, Sales Manager of the Olds Motor Works, arrived in this city yesterday on a tour of the coast. The eastern motor maker is enthusiastic over the prospects for the coming automobile season. In discussing the automobile situation, Mr. Stokes said: "Everything looks bright for the motor business next year. I have received the best reports during my present tour from our agents. The demand for lower priced cars is nothing more than was expected by the manufacturers, and while I believe in the makers of cars taking care of the new class of trade, I do not believe that the really low priced cars will ever predominate. The factory that strikes the happy medium between the very cheap and the very high priced cars will in my opinion continue to get the majority of the business." Although only having been in the city one day, Stokes was sporting the colors of the Million Club of San Francisco.

The sharp bracing air was enjoyed by a large number of motorists on the Foot Hill Boulevard last Sunday. A few of the well known enthusiasts were Mrs. C. Clay in her Thomas demi-limousine; Mrs. Witter in her Thomas Flyer; Mr. George Haas in his Chalmers-Detroit Roadster; Mr. Frank Wear and Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Hicks in their Oldsmobiles; Mr. Fred Morton in his Chalmers-Detroit Runabout, and a number of others. Incidentally Mr. Morgan was "pinched" for speeding on the homeward bound trip and emerged from the ordeal with a heavy heart, a lighter purse and a number of other mixed feelings, for he had just cleaned out a number of other fast cars.

Mr. S. S. Freeman, accompanied by his wife and daughter, have just finished a trip to Mexico and return in a Model G 28 horsepower Franklin car. Mr. Freeman reports the road in fine condition. He covered the down trip to Los Angeles from his home in Alameda in 21 hours, 25 minutes in running time, and on his return trip in 20 hours, 5 minutes running time. The distance between Santa Barbara and Los Angeles was negotiated in 4 hours, 5 minutes, which is about record time. He reports absolutely no trouble on the trip, not even a punctured tire.

Ten thousand people saw the thirty horsepower White Steam Car owned by Millionaire Blair of Billings, Monta, and known as the White Flyer, circle the mile Tanforan Track here Sunday after in 59 seconds. This performance lowered the track record three seconds and was faster than the best time made by Oldfield in his 120 horsepower Stearns racer; also Soules with his 60 horsepower Stearns racer; also the Christie racing machine, which is credited with 200 horsepower, and the specially constructed Comet racer. The showing of the White is all the more creditable when the poor condition of the track is taken into consideration. It had been raining here for two days previous to the meet, and there were several inches of mud all around the pole. Gus Seyfried, a San Francisco boy, who piloted the White, had never before driven this car which is constructed entirely of stock parts but underhung and with a wind-splitting nose for track work. In the races for strictly stock cars, the White also carried off the honors. The first event was for machines costing $2,000 and under. The 1909 20 horsepower White Steamer was at the tape, but no cars would compete against it, and the judges awarded it the race. In the contest for cars costing $4,000 and under, two 30 horsepower White Steamers driven by Seyfried and Donald Whalley finished first and second.

The local automobile dealers are very much interested in the fight being made by other commercial organizations in this city against the proposed raise in freight rates from the east. Notice has been given members of the automobile trade to the effect that beginning January 1st an increase in the freight rates on automobiles will be adopted by the transcontinental roads. In discussing the proposed raise in freight rates, E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Company said: "The proposed change in rates on automobiles will certainly work a hardship on the representatives of big cars. The automobile industry of this city has grown to great proportions. We get several carloads of Thomas and Chalmers-Detroit motor cars every month and our freight bills run up to several thousand dollars a month. Judging by our shipments, the automobiles brought through from eastern points by all of the local dealers, aggregate hundreds of thousands of dollars annually, and the proposed raise in rates on certain classes of these machines will work to the disadvantage of the sellers in this city. I am in favor of the Automobile Dealers' Association taking steps to prevent the change."



H. L. Whitmore, Stockton agent for Chalmers-Detroit and Thomas cars, arrived in this city Monday for the purpose of taking delivery of a shipment of Chalmers cars. Whitmore says the prospects for a good season in the San Joaquin Valley are bright. "I have sold all the cars I had on hand and have orders for three more," said he. "I expect to sell about twenty cars this season."

W. E. Travis, who has been spending several weeks on the coast, and who will handle the German Mercedes car in the west, received a big disappointment Monday in the shape of a telegram stating that his demonstrating car had arrived in New York and the demand there being so strong, R. E. Fulton, United States representative of the Mercedes car, had made a sale of it in New York. From a letter received recently from Mr. Fulton it would seem that the demand for high grade automobiles, both American and foreign, has been so great that all the factories are running over time.

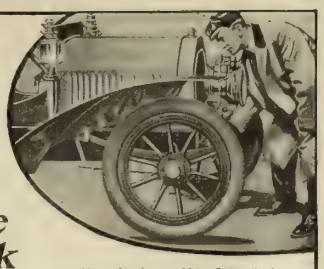
Whimsicalities of Children

The worm turns, and the poor children who have been stuffed and crammed with "Nature Series" on every possible topic, can now rejoice in the "Denatured Series" in which Professor Wood has so admirably burlesqued the solemn teachings of some of his contemporaries. Last year he helped the infant world to differentiate the animals from the flowers, and now he has prepared a series of "Animal Analogues" in which the most unlikely and improbable (at first glance) comparisons and contrasts of the animals themselves have been suggested and helped out by clever drawings. The children really enjoy and appreciate these whimsicalities, which is more than can be claimed in the majority of instances for juveniles selected and praised by adults, who have lost touch with youthful minds. The style of binding which has been selected for these "denatured" rhymes is reminiscent of the old-fashioned text-books in the days when the Blue-backed Speller, Town's Readers, Cornell's Geographies and Goold Brown's Grammar were familiar to every household. Paul Elder & Co. are sponsors.



A Typical Phelps Story

Given a painted madonna wife with a dog, a humanly selfish flesh and blood husband, a very young child of either sex, addicted to baby talk long after normal infants are capable of intelligent speech; a little rift that widens to a chasm, but eventually narrows again to a crack so as to provide a happy ending and a medical school, and there need be no prize offered to stimulate the guessing faculties as to authorship. It is Elizabeth Stuart Phelps just as certainly as "Little Jack Horner" is Mother Goose. Of course all this calls for a New England setting. This time it is in one of the small coast villages which boasts a summer population addicted to villas and cottages and all the vices which accompany them. Cara Sterling and her invalid father are summer residents with the virtues the others of the colony lack. Cara is the owner of a superb collie with a deep scar on his handsome head and a deep-seated grudge against Dr. Frost, one of the visitors and an expert physiologist. No one can understand the attitude of the ordinarily peaceable animal toward the man, whose right hand he seems determined to mangle, a design which he eventually carries out. Of course any one who is familiar with Mrs. Phelps' crusade against vivisection sees in an instant the connection between Dr. Frost's right hand and the scar on Clyde's head. There is another doctor in the case, Chanceford Dane, the village practitioner, apparently an excellent physician despite the fact that he is not in love with his profession. Dane is a poor man yet he is the successful seeker of the hand of Cara Sterling, and as she is wealthy in her own right and her father's consent is readily given to the union, the two are married. Now begins a characteristically Phelpish situation. Rollingstall Sterling proves to be an embezzler. Not only his own fortune but that of his daughter and everyone else who has trusted him has been lost in speculation, and Sterling is saved from suicide only by the timely intervention of a spasm of heart disease. With the fortune evaporated hard times begin for the young couple. The saintly wife becomes only more saintly under the affliction, while the earthly man begins to develop the characteristics he inherited from his own father. The companion villain to Dr. Frost, the vivisectionist, is a Mrs. Douce Marriott, who manages to entangle the handsome Dr. Dane in her web, and ere long there is a domestic smash and the Spanish war comes along in time to permit the doctor to disappear in the wake of the army. A telegram reports his death, a body is sent home to be buried, and in due course of time a shipwreck sends on shore the almost lifeless remnant of a man who in time takes up the duties of the village doctor. This Dr. Royal is middle aged, broken and bruised, but proves himself a wonderful healer. In appearance and character he is the direct opposite of Dr. Dane, with whom he is eventually identified, though it will be hardly fair to expose all the mystery. As usual it is his extreme devotion to his own child that first pulls the corner of the curtain aside. Of course one should sympathize most deeply with the poor, wronged wife, but one cannot help wondering whether the menage would not have run more smoothly if Cara had come down from her gilded frame, lifted Dr. Dane off his pedestal,turned the dog out and not tried to delude herself into the notion of heaven all by their lone selves instead of a very earthy earth along with other people. The conversion of Mrs. Douce Marriott, after being permitted to peep through the crack of Death's door, is rather far fetched, for she was not content to give up her frivolities, but had to join the Salvation Army, bonnet, tambourine and all. It is not particularly surprising that, with the capacity for a certain kind of martyrdom—and a pet dog—that Mrs. Phelps' heroines always seem to cultivate, they are given a chance to wear the crown and palm. With a little more plain sense and adaptability they could save themselves and readers likewise all the agonies they revel in. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Holland and Castro

If there were no danger of infringing the copyright of the Monroe Doctrine perhaps it would be a good idea to let Holland and Venezuela fight it out. The gayety of nations has not been incited by a comic opera war for a long time; the nearest approach to this phase of the human comedy being our brisk little skirmish with Spain in which the mule of Matanzas figured so conspicuously and Colonel Roosevelt's picture was painted by an artist who imagined our national hero leading the charge up San Juan Hill. It was a glorious victory. The Dutch are sturdy fighters and on two memorable occasions they almost twisted the tail out of the British lion—once when Von Tromp nailed a broom at his masthead to indicate that it was his intention to sweep the English from the seven seas; and again when the Boers crumpled the invincible British squares at Maegersfontein and Ladysmith. Unquestionably the Dutch are good fighters if they can get within rifle range or sword distance of the enemy. But the Venezuelans have them at a disadvantage in that there is no Venezuelan navy for the Dutchmen to fight and the Dutch are too far from home to transport an army large enough to make a successful landing on the soil of Venezuela. Besides it is doubtful if the Monroe Doctrine would permit such landing. So it resolves itself into a war of words chiefly, with an occasional swoop of the Dutch cruisers upon a Venezuelan towboat armored with sheet iron and equipped with a brace of exaggerated horse pistols. There is no doubt that the foreign policy of President Castro has been irritating; but we cannot help admiring his bluff and bluster—his bantam effrontery in the presence of the master powers of the world. Moreover we must take into consideration that most of his troubles with these powers has been induced by the predatory habits of subjects of foreign nations who have sneaked into Venezuela under a false pretense and once in possession of a profitable "concession" undertake to dictate to the dictator. If Castro is a peppery personage quick of entrance to a quarrel, we must not forget that the fellows with whom he quarrels are of the variety that we prosecute for embezzlement and forgery in this country and who are watched by the police of every city in Europe. There is no doubt that these "concessionaries" have not only exceeded the terms of their concessions but have also defied the courts and the laws of Venezuela. Therefore it must be admitted even by the enemies of Castro that their efforts against him are in the nature of a bill collector's demand for payment of a debt fraudulently thrust upon the debtor by some sharper. President Cleveland knew the Venezuelan game pretty well, as our British cousins found out when they attempted to lay hands on the little republic. It is presumed that President Roosevelt also knows the game, and we are curious to see how far he will let Holland go in this armed dunning expedition. We fear that he is acting under the advice of Mr. Root, and if so that will account for the distance that Holland has gone already in apparent defiance of the traditional restrictions of the Monroe Doctrine.

The Directoire Waltz

It has not yet been decreed in San Francisco that we must follow the style in dancing that has been adopted by the "Academy of Paris Dancing Masters," but doubtless we shall soon fall into line. We cannot afford to ignore the styles of Paris. To do so is to be worse than provincial; it is to be archaic. Sometimes from lack of courage we are slow in adopting a French fashion, but the spirit is never unwilling howsoever weak the flesh. So far as the newest terpsichorean wrinkle is concerned it should commend itself not only to the merely fashionable but also to the rational, being as it is the legitimate offspring of circumstances. From the dancing masters of Paris, men versed in phenomena peculiar to the pampered female of the species, we learn that the Directoire gown, which comes from Paris, made the new fashion in dancing urgent and imperative. Clinging as it does to the female form whether divine or artificial it imprisons the knees and deprives women of the free use of their legs, thus rendering them incapable of graceful movement. In other words the Directoire is the insidious enemy of the muse of the many twinkling feet, the legs of whose votaries according to Byron "must move to conquer as they fly." The dancing masters of Paris viewed with alarm, not to say consternation, the awkward antics of the directoired nimble nymph as she limped through the mazes of the waltz, which, despite its Teutonic extraction is nowhere more ardently cultivated than in Paris. Soberly they discussed the matter in convention assembled, and Professor Lefort took occasion to remark that the pavan, a slow, stately dance, was introduced at a time wide mantles and ample, tuckered dresses were in fashion. "Therefore," said he, "according to the traditions of the art of dancing, the dances of the hour should be always arranged to suit the fashions of the hour in women's attire." This sentiment appealed to the intelligence of every dancing master in the convention and the result was the adoption of this resolution:

"Whereas in every age and in every country dances have always been improvised to suit the prevailing fashion in feminine attire; whereas it has recently and till now been the custom to dance with long, gliding steps, we, the assembled masters of the art of dancing in Paris, hereby decree that this year and hereafter dances now in fashion shall be executed with very short steps, so as to suit the existing fashion of wearing Directoire dresses."

This is a resolution that doubtless will meet with the approbation of our arbiter elegantiarum, Mr. Ned Greenway, who, though he never has worn a Directoire, of late years in the waltz has been inclined not only to short steps but also to short breaths.

Honesty of the Press

A good newspaper is the noblest work of the managing editor. A good newspaper prints the news fully according to a trained judgment, fairly in the interest of the intelligent reader, and impartially to the end that no wrong may be done to anyone. A good newspaper is without prejudice even in its partisan attitude upon any issue. It never seeks to stir the rancor of the community, but presents its argument as an able advocate addresses an honest court; for the newspaper stands in the same relation to the public that an attorney holds in the presence of a tribunal of equity and justice. The public is the court of last appeal for every newspaper; the cause that it espouses is its client. When a newspaper undertakes to force its opinion on the public with bluster, false assumption and vituperation, it is guilty of contempt of court; it is vicious, vindictive, ignorant or foolish; it insults the intelligence of its readers either out of its own incompetence or designedly. In either case it is a bad newspaper. It may survive its evil influence by furnishing more news and better news than a newspaper of better moral stamina without superior or equal news facilities. But it cannot escape the contempt of those who are compelled to buy it for the news that cannot be obtained elsewhere. And there comes a time, oft repeated it may be, when the public revolts against even the best newspaper thus conducted. Honesty in the newspaper business is a policy as essential to steady success as in any other business. The honest newspaper never loses in the long run. An honest newspaper even when it is honest in its error is respected. An intelligent community is never at a loss to discriminate between an honest opinion upon a false issue or a bad cause and a dishonest opinion in any cause. The mass of the people are quick to discern the motive behind an editorial opinion; and newspapers are invariably judged by their sincerity, their motives and their honesty. The only substantial asset in the newspaper business is honesty. How many honest newspapers are published in San Francisco?

The Conviction of Ruef

The long-delayed, tedious and turbulent trial of Abe Ruef reached a most satisfactory end last week when a jury of the defendant's peers agreed on a verdict of guilty. Though the case of the People versus Abe Ruef is not a subject of continued exultation in the retrospect his conviction is most gratifying. While we cannot help lamenting the tardiness of justice in his case, a circumstance due to a policy which we have persistently reprobated, we feel that the community is deserving of felicitation on what must be regarded as a great triumph. If, as we believe, the policy pursued in the Ruef case was productive of most mischievous consequences, for that very reason it should not be regarded as altogether lamentable. As ambergris is acquired in whales at the cost of a considerable degeneration of the creature, so are valuable knowledge and priceless experience in the body politic. As a result of the policy pursued in the Ruef case great scandal has been brought upon our courts and our judicial officers, the motives of some of our most distinguished civic patriots have been impugned, and the most charitable view that now can be taken of their tactics is that they were betrayed by natural defects of discretion and original incapacity for calculating consequences. Books may be written in their defense but the whole nadus of the question lies in a single problem of thirteen words: Why was a plenary indulgence vouchsafed the man who debauched our city government? There can be no doubt that the secret compact with Ruef was the cause of much irritation and much scandal, but it has afforded us a very valuable lesson in the management of civic affairs. Upon us has been impressed the importance of keeping the administration of justice in the hands of public functionaries. Upon the men behind the Graft Prosecution to whom we should be grateful for having driven the grafters out of office, has been impressed the worthlessness of the immunity bath and of the testimony of informers. The conviction of Ruef, followed as it was by the acquittal of Murphy, should not tend to confirm them in their original error of judgment. Even among the jury that convicted Ruef were men who said they would not convict a dog on the testimony of a Gallagher. That this sentiment did not amount to an obsession is of no importance since we know that in Ruef's case certain adventitious aids to justice were invoked most happily; whether with the approval of sound conscience, or to the permanent benefit of the community are questions we shall not undertake to answer. Suffice it that we believe the graft prosecutors have had an awakening. Men of average intelligence, they must have had touches of self-reproach that cast a shadow upon their hour of triumph. To them must have come the vivid, illuminating conviction, that when they entered into a compact with Ruef on the principle of swallowing a camel and straining at a gnat, they blundered egregiously. For what was the result? They were driven to a variety of expedients, which, in the opinion of captious critics, were in discord with the spirit of American justice. In the end, it is true, their efforts were crowned with success, but the glory of the triumph is dimmed by the knowledge that the prosecutors were once willing to forgive the author of the most malefic influence that ever tormented an American community. It may be suggested that in our joy over the conviction of Ruef we should be too magnanimous to indulge in unpleasant reminiscence, but not to do so is to ignore the lesson of experience, the very thing that compensates for much that has happened. Besides to retrospect at this time is but to yield to an irresistible but amiable impulse. Innocent of invidious design we ponder the dark backward out of which loom the ghosts of curious and vain strategems. How instructive to recall that the Hon. J. J. Dwyer, one of the special prosecutors, was the man that formed a bathetic tableau with Ruef on that memorable day when the fallen boss in the theatic role of a crushed penitent, wept crocodile tears in open court to give verisimilitude to an otherwise bald and unconvincing narrative? How well we remember the efforts subsequently made to persuade the dear pee-pul that the penitent one was "more sinned against than sinning." How singular and humiliating the vicissitudes that may be traced to the rebuff that was given to Opportunity when she stood beaming on the Graft Prosecution with widespread, rosy arms and heaving midriff. Not the least notable of them were those in which Mr. Dwyer figured. The Dwyer that wept with Ruef was the Dwyer that volunteered to prosecute him on a charge which the Graft Prosecution had agreed to dismiss, their own testimony being that the only charges which they insisted on bludgeoning him with were those that grew out of the French restaurant cases. And to convict him on that charge Hiram Johnson had to go so far beyond the bounds of propriety as to dare the jury to acquit, and it was deemed necessary to introduce a coup-de-theatre in the court-room while the jury was deliberating. So we say that in view of all that has occurred the policy pursued in the Ruef case has not been without profit. Since the execution of the immunity contract the prosecutors have become not only much older but also much wiser and doubtless much better men. Whatever we may think of their methods we must admit that their persistency is enduring and far from futile. For the conviction of Ruef they are entitled to loud and prolonged applause.

One of the Standard Authors

In Oakland last week St. Mary's College won a debate, upholding the proposition "that the worth of Scott's poetry is greater than that of his novels." This is a proposition that may well be the subject of critical inquiry, but is it not surprising to learn that college debating societies of this day and generation are giving their attention to the author of "Ivanhoe" and "The Lay of the Last Minstrel"? The generally accepted idea among the illuminati is that Scott was a second-class poet; and unquestionably as a novelist he is very much neglected, the objection being urged against him that he is too long-winded; that he wrote endless prefaces and colossal introductions and exhibited too too great a propensity to minuteness of detail. As a consequence Scott has become a standard author. Which means that he is seldom read. But as a matter of fact Scott is one of the giants of literature, and though as he himself confessed he was "beaten out of poetry" by Byron, he is not a second-class poet, nor in romance has he ever been equalled or even approached. However, for the time being he has taken a back seat, and poets as well as novelists much inferior to him are ranked above him by Chautauqua critics and college professors whose disciples believe it to be a mark of superior knowledge to deride the affectations of Macaulay, to ridicule the fatal facility of Byron and lament the commonplaces of Scott. We are living in a smart age and we will have nothing to do with the obvious in art. We love subtlety so much that occasionally we pronounce a poem great because it is unintelligible. Fiction no longer interests us unless the writer has a thesis to maintain or a doctrine to expound concerning human life. A story that is nothing more than a story is too trivial to engage attention. Hence, Scott with his kindly wisdom, his genial humor, his tragic grandeur is a back number. The modern idea of romance is that incidents must troop through the pages with great rapidity. There must always be something doing. Scott's heroes loved to linger over the viands and stimulate the flow of soul. Therefore they bore. His fights are realistic when swords are aloft, in siege or on the greensward, when steel rings or bucklers clash, but he is prolix, his style is involved and his dialogue is slow. Quick action is the desideratum nowadays. There was a time when Scott made men feel the robustness and joyousness of life, when he thrilled them with his situations of human interest, some of which are the strongest ever invented, but our susceptibilities have been schooled beyond his influence. As a poet Scott has few equals in the power of description. The vivacity of some of his poetic descriptions is unsurpassed. Some critics have said that his tale of Flodden Fight in "Marmion" is the best battle-piece in all the poetry of all time, better even than the stand of Aias by the ships in the Iliad, better than the slaying of the wooers in the Odyssey, but we of this advanced age know that Scott's poetry abounds in the commonplaces of diction and sentiment; that he stooped to conquer the mob with trite expressions and familiar images; that he exceeds the limits of license in his metre and sets the teeth of fastidious readers on edge, and therefore we will have none of him. We may condescend to admit that he has a sonorous and melodious style of versification, and that he compensates for the looseness of his diction by the animation and color of his descriptions, but we must still maintain that the obviousness of him is fatal. Some day perhaps the critical estimate of Scott will change, as it changed in the case of Shakespeare, who, admired by contemporaries, fell afterwards into neglect only to rise again and soar beyond criticism; as it changed also in the case of Beethoven and in the case of Meyerbeer. In his day Sir Walter Scott was the most popular of writers, but now the higher critics are of the opinion that his theory of esthetics was all wrong. Nevertheless the inclination is strong in us to felicitate the young college men who have not yet been educated above the possibility of enjoying Scott, for despite that romancer's banalities he wrote with a keen and healthful relish of all the good things of life, and his characters, with all their bombastic speech and godlike quality, were fashioned of common clay.

The Failure of Our Universities

According to the testimony of many learned observers our universities are a delusion and a snare inasmuch as they are but half educating men. In the opinion of such distinguished critics as Dr. James P. Munroe and Dr. Scripture, the universities are not turning out scholars, but in their mad passion for specialization they are developing pedants, cramming young men with facts but failing to give them a broad outlook upon history, upon human experience and upon human life. As a consequence the average college graduate is a narrow-minded prig, clever enough in his specialty, but not likely "to achieve that highest success which comes through the widest social usefulness." Dr. Munroe and Dr. Scripture have but repeated in their own language what has been said in these columns so often that we have suspected ourselves of becoming fanatical on the subject. But we do not agree with them in their judgment respecting the cause of the inefficiency of our universities. The weakness of these institutions is not entirely due to overspecialization, but in a large measure to the character of the men who supply the academic atmosphere. The average college professor is not a man of wide sympathies, able to understand that there are real and important interests for mankind outside the limit of his own special study. Typical of the average college professor is the geologist of one of our universities who affirmed with the air of a seer that landscape painting can have no value except to present correctly the facts of stratification. Typical of the intellect that dominates our universities is that of the Rev. Benjamin Ide Wheeler who asserted that it was a mistake for an American to go to Oxford because that university does not train men for the struggle for existence in this country. Very few of our college professors are men of the world. Fresh from their alma mater, they enter the educational field and undertake to train young men for contact with real life. All they know of real life they learned from professors as narrow and as self-centered as themselves. Their idea of education is that it should qualify a man for some particular pursuit; so qualify him that he may attain the success which so few ever carry off even with decency. Now this is a most mischievous system. It is mischievous not merely because men fail to get the mental equipment which they have sought, but because of the evil influence on the nation itself of a widespread diffusion of that which is far more to be dreaded than ignorance—a little learning. As in the days of Bentham there are many absurd and mischievous fallacies which pass readily in the world for sense and virtue while in reality they only tend to fortify error and encourage crime, and in this day and generation it is through the medium of our universities that these are propagated. Our university professors are today preaching against the very things for which they are blindly stimulating a passion. Opposed as they are in spirit to the characteristic theories of a university, to the most superficial and ostentatious sentiments they attribute the highest importance while neglecting the most sacred of fundamental principles. Every new fad in science, politics and sociology has a college professor for sponser. There are of course many college professors with breadth of mental vision, but unquestionably they are greatly outnumbered by the embodiments of opinionated ignorance who have yet to learn that the popular theories of the hour are the worn-out, rejected axioms of ages agone and that dogmatism is the unpardonable sin against good manners. These half-baked philosophers are hardly competent to give young men the training that ensures deliberation and patience; to make them understand that there is something to be said on every side of everything; in short, to school minds to habitual restraint and sobriety. These men are not suffering from over-specialization. The trouble with them is that with all their erudition they have not learned that it is temperament and not the point of view that guides us into the paths we should tread. Temperament is what they have neglected to cultivate.

The Instinct of Lying Low

By E. D. Cuming

Is there a wild beast or bird that, taken by surprise, will not seek safety in standing or sitting perfectly still? They do it, of every kind and size from the bison to the squirrel, from the ostrich to the wren; and we have it in the action, or inaction, of certain snakes. Let any woodland creature discover that the enemy man is within such distance that flight without revealing its presence is impossible, and it becomes a statue depending upon rigid immobility to escape notice. The efficacy of this is extraordinary under ordinarily favorable circumstances. I have stood within twenty yards of a sambhur stag in dense jungle utterly unable to see the antlers to which a native follower pointed with wealth of gesticulation, and until speech broke the spell and the animal betrayed his whereabouts by turning to run away. A leopard "drowsing" on the limb of a tree almost overhanding the sandy patch on which human footsteps were inaudible even to his ears, slowly crouched a little closer to his perch and remained stone-still, eyeing us until the rifle too quickly raised suggested flight as the better part. The bison when the first alarm is close at hand stands like a statue, muzzle thrust out, till he ascertains the direction whence danger threatens. It would seem as though every wild animal, whatever its bulk, were perfectly conscious of the exactness with which it and its surroundings harmonize, and knew that movement would betray.

It is curious to notice how this instinct operates under conditions so unfavorable to concealment that even the lowest intelligence might recognize its futility. The rabbit, routed out of its retreat in the undergrowth by a dog, and coming suddenly upon man, will crouch on the open path and remain still for as long as the man has patience to remain still also. One of the most curious examples of confidence in immobility that ever came under my notice was in a wood in Norway: wandering over the deep tussocks which deadened footfall I came upon a squirrel busy with a fir cone on a stump: I was within a few paces of him before he discovered me and he sprang into the nearest tree, a young pine, five feet high or thereabout. There was no other refuge near, save two trees between us, and the squirrel decided that safety lay in stillness; he sat upright on a twig, one fore paw clasping the main stem, the other against his breast, his head turned to face me; and in this posture he remained as I advanced to see how close he would suffer me to approach. When six feet (as measured afterwards) separated us I stopped. The squirrel remained absolutely still, his eyes fixed on me; my hands were behind and I found my pulse. It was at about the two hundred and fiftieth beat, or well over three minutes, that the seance was closed by an untimely sneeze; this startled the squirrel and he leapt to the ground to find a safer retreat in a distant fir. It was impossible that the little creature should have had a sense of concealment; the tree was a poor and scraggy thing, a stem and three twigs; and there was not a twig of the slenderest between the squirrel's person and my own. It was obvious that he relied upon immobility for his safety, and, unless he timed his winks to coincide with mine, he never stirred an eyelid.

No animal depends more frequently or more successfully upon stillness in danger than the hare. Approach a hare in her form, as you may do, and she prefers immobility to flight. A hare has been known to lie still while a whole pack of harriers passed her place of concealment; she only moved when one of the hounds actually put his foot on her. Reliance upon immobility reaches its height, as we might expect, in those creatures which most closely resemble their habitat: the pangolin suggests itself as a striking example. Clinging with its hind feet to the tree trunk, and supported by the pressure of its tail, it may safely rely on being mistaken for the broken stump of a branch it takes as its model.

Birds adopt a somewhat similar method when taken by surprise, more particularly hen-birds on the nest; but here we have reason in that the depth of the nest in many cases affords real concealment save to beak and tail. The pheasant offers an accessible example of the instinct under discussion, but the bird does not depend on immobility in the attitude in which it is surprised, it crouches and stretches the neck along the ground; and among dead leaves, in rough grass or equally favorable surroundings, thus becomes difficult of detection. I recall an instance of the "keep-still" instinct in a snake. Riding through a bamboo jungle one morning I pulled up for some reason or other, and glancing into the bamboo which bellied over the track saw within a foot of my face one of the common pale-green "bamboo snakes." The reptile lay perfectly still across the twigs facing me, though within very easy reach of my hand. So admirably did it harmonize with the green shoots and leaves that detection of it was the merest accident; it was not disturbed by the fidgeting of the fly-worried horse, and lay there, still as the bamboo twig it resembled, until I shook its perch, when, apparently deeming immobility "played out," it glided rapidly away over the boughs. We see survival of the same instinct in domestic animals. Frighten a cat, and if she be uncertain of the direction whence the danger threatens she remains perfectly still till the point is made clear to her. Apropos of this instinct, may it not be that the trick of shamming death, in which the fox, among other animals, is said to be so proficient, is its highest development? As every hunting man who keeps his eyes open knows, the fox is a past-master of the art of keeping still when emergency suggests. The supposition that shamming death is simply an artistic improvement by a clever animal whose wits have been sharpened by generations of pursuit does not seem unreasonable: from keeping still when the enemy is within arm's length to keeping still when the enemy's hand is actually upon him is not a long step.

The man who can remain still when necessary finds that wild creatures can be deceived, even as they hope to deceive. I have had so shy a bird as a willow wren perch upon my foot and remain there for an appreciable time. Sit still and you shall see the rabbit emerge from his burrow—a step he will never take if he suspect a watcher. Sit still and you may see the wild duck with her "fleet" of ducklings swim past you within twenty feet. To him who can keep still come the wariest and the wildest creatures of woodland and marsh. It is movement that alarms: the motionless figure is unseen, or, if seen, is unrecognized.

The Conscript

(Translated from the French of Honore de Balzac. Though the author of the human comedy is not ranked among writers of short stories he did sufficient short story writing to prove himself a master of that art. The Conscript, written before he conceived the plan of The Human Comedy, like most of his work was designed for a purpose. It is what he was pleased to term a philosophic study, and such it is though it may seem to be nothing more than a sensational story. It has been said that he wrote the story for the sole purpose of uttering the sentiment with which it ends.—Editor)

One evening in the month of November, 1793, Madame de Dey of Carentan closed the door of her salon to the people who were accustomed to assemble there. This occurrence caused a sensation in Carentan similar to what might have been produced in Paris by the closing of all the theatres.

To understand the secret anxiety of Madame de Dey it is necessary to understand the role she played at Carentan. She was the widow of a lieutenant-general and chevalier of the Orders. Leaving the court at the beginning of the emigration she took refuge at Carentan where she possessed considerable property, and where she expected to escape the evils of the Terror. Though formerly when she visited Carentan she entertained only the nobility, she now threw open her doors to the leading bourgeois of the town, and by her graciousness and amiability won the esteem of all.

About thirty-eight years of age, she still retained, not that fresh buxom beauty which distinguishes the young women of Lower Normandy, but a slender, and, so to speak, aristocratic beauty. Married in the flower of her youth to an old and jealous soldier, the falseness of her position in the centre of a dissipated court contributed much, no doubt, to cast a veil of serious melancholy over her face on which the charm and vivacity of love must formerly have shone bright. The happiness and pleasures of which her married life had been deprived, she found in her excessive love for her son. She loved him not only with the pure and profound devotion of a mother, but with the coquetry of a mistress, the jealousy of a wife. She was unhappy when separated from him, anxious during his absence, could never see enough of him, lived only in him and for him. In order to make men understand the strength of this feeling, it will suffice to add that this son was not only Madame de Dey's old child, but her last remaining relative, the only living being to whom she could attach the fears, the hopes, and the joys of her life. The late Count de Dey was the last scion of his family, as she was the last heiress of hers. Thus human schemes and interests were in accord with the noblest cravings of the soul to intensify in the countess's heart a sentiment which is always strong in women.

Thanks to constant care, her son had grown and had attained such perfect development, that at twenty years of age he was considered one of the most accomplished cavaliers at Versailles. Lastly—a piece of good fortune which does not crown the efforts of all mothers—she was adored by her son; their hearts were bound together by sympathies that were fraternal. Even if they had not been connected by the decree of nature, they would have felt instinctively for each other that affection of one being for another so rarely met with in life. Appointed sublieutenant of dragoons at eighteen, the young man had complied with the prevailing ideas of the requirements of honor at that period, by following the princes when they emigrated.

Thus Madame de Dey, of noble birth, wealthy, and the mother of an emigre, was fully alive to the dangers of her painful situation. As she had no other aim than to preserve a great fortune for her son, she had renounced the happiness of accompanying him; but, when she read the harsh laws by virtue of which the Republic daily confiscated the property of the emigres at Carentan, she applauded herself for her courageous act. Was she not guarding her son's treasures at the peril of her life? Then, when she learned of the shocking executions ordered by the Convention, she slept undisturbed, happy to know that her only treasure was in safety, far from all perils and all scaffolds. She took pleasure in the belief that she had adopted the best course to save all his fortunes at once. Making the concessions to this secret thought which the disasters of the time demanded, without compromising her womanly dignity or her aristocratic beliefs, she enveloped her sorrows in impenetrable mystery. She had realized the difficulties which awaited her at Carentan. To go thither and assume the first place in society—was it not equivalent to defying the scaffold every day? But, sustained by a mother's courage, she succeeded in winning the affection of the poor by relieving all sorts of misery indiscriminately, and made herself necessary to the rich by taking the lead in their pleasures.

She received the prosecuting attorney of the commune, the mayor, the president of the district, the public accuser, and even the judges of the Revolutionary Tribunal. The first four of these functionaries, being unmarried, paid court to her, in the hope of marrying her, whether by terrifying her by the injury which they had it in their power to do her, or by offering her their protection. The public accuser, formerly an attorney at Caen, where he had been employed by the countess, tried to win her love by conduct full of devotion and generosity. A dangerous scheme! He was the most formidable of all the suitors. He alone was thoroughly acquainted with the condition of his former client's large fortune. His passion was inevitably intensified by all the cravings of an avarice which rested upon almost unlimited power, upon the right of life or death throughout the district. This man, who was still young, displayed so much nobility in his behavior that Madame de Dey had been unable as yet to make up her mind concerning him. But, scorning the danger that lay in a contest of wits with Normans, she employed the inventive genius and the cunning which nature has allotted to woman, to play those rivals against one another. By gaining time, she hoped to arrive safe and sound at the end of her troubles. At that time, the royalists in the interior of France flattered themselves that each day would see the close of the Revolution; and that conviction was the ruin of a great many of them.

Despite these obstalces, the countess had skillfully maintained her independence down to the day when, with incomprehensible imprudence, she had conceived the idea of closing her door. The interest which she inspired was so profound and so genuine that the people who came to her house that evening were greatly distressed when they learned that it was impossible for her to receive them; then, with the outspoken curiosity which is a part of provincial manners, they inquired concerning the misfortune, the sorrow, or the disease which had afflicted Madame de Dey. To these questions, an old housekeeper called Brigitte replied that her mistress had shut herself into her room, and would not see anybody, not even her servants.

"If she were ill," said one curious individual, "she would have sent for the doctor; but the doctor was at my house all day, playing chess. He said with a laugh that in these days there is but one disease, and that is unfortunately incurable."

This jest was put forward apologetically. Thereupon, men, women, old men, and maidens began to search the vast field of conjecture. Every one fancied that he caught a glimpse of a secret, and that secret engrossed the imaginations of them all. The next day, the suspicions became embittered. As life in a small town is open to all, the women were the first to learn that Brigitte had laid in more supplies than usual at the market. That fact could not be denied.

On the second day, when they learned that Madame de Dey proclaimed that she was indisposed, the principal persons of Carentan met in the evening at the house of the mayor's brother, an ex-merchant, a married man, of upright character and generally esteemed, and for whom the countess entertained a high regard. There all the aspirants to the rich widow's hand had a more or less probable story to tell; and each of them hoped to turn to his advantage the secret circumstances which forced her to compromise herself thus. The public accuser imagined a complete drama in which Madame de Dey's son was brought to her house by night. The mayor favored the idea of a priest who had not taken the oath, arriving from La Vendee and asking her for shelter; but the purchase of a hare on Friday embarrassed the mayor greatly. The president of the district was strong in his conviction that it was a leader of Chouans or of Vendeans, hotly pursued. Others suggested a nobleman escaped from one of the prisons of Paris. In short, one and all suspected the countess of being guilty of one of those acts of generosity which the laws of that day stigmatized as crimes, and which might lead to the scaffold.

The countess's sincere friends were so alarmed for her that, during the morning of the third day, the procureur-syndic of the commune caused his wife to write her a note to urge her to receive as usual that evening. The old merchant, being bolder, called at Madame de Dey's house in the morning. Trusting in the service which he proposed to render her, he demanded to be shown to her presence, and was thunderstruck when he saw her in the garden, engaged in cutting the last flowers from the beds, to supply her vases.

"Doubtless she has been sheltering her lover," said the old man to himself, seized with compassion for the fascinating woman.

The strange expression on the countess's face confirmed him in his suspicions. Deeply touched by that devotion so natural to a woman, and which always moves our admiration, because all men are flattered by the sacrifices which a woman makes for a man, the merchant informed the countess of the reports which were current in the town, and of the dangerous position in which she stood.

"But," he said, as he concluded, "although there are some among our officials who are not indisposed to forgive you for an act of heroism of which a priest is the object, no one will pity you if they discover that you are sacrificing yourself to the affections of the heart."

At these words Madame de Dey looked at the old man with an expression of desperation and terror which made him shudder, old man though he was.

"Come," said she, taking his hand and leading him to

The Spectator

Our Lady of the Shattered Dome

What shall we do with our "angel"? As long as she perched on the apex of the dome of our City Hall she was a thing of beauty. Against the skyline of our metropolis she loomed grand, gloomy and peculiar, wrapped in the majesty of her solitude, "like the night of cloudless climes and starry skies." Now that she is to come off her perch there is none so poor to do her reverence. She is a deformed, grotesque, fantastic excrescence. She is neither man nor woman, she is neither brute nor human—she's a ghoul! Afar she was something ethereal, light and airy, like a lady in the sky; close at gaze she is a hideous monster scarcely fit to gargoyle the cornice of a hospital for lepers. We will have none of her. She is rejected of men. She is denied place in our streets and parks to companion Cogswellian effigies in iron and Phelanesque images graven in bronze. Moreover, she is only half an angel for she is wingless and gendered wrong because there are really no angels of the feminine sex except in the imagination of artists and sculptors. Therefore I ask again, What shall we do with our "angel"? Shall we send her to the junk shop or shall we set her up in the Park museum as an antique relic and souvenir of our great disaster? I think this last is the better disposal. She is ugly enough if she is somewhat too long, to serve as a memento of the dark days and flame-illumined nights when the earth was trembling and a city was homeless awaiting in shivering dread for the blast on Gabriel's horn of doom. As it has been decided that our angel is not an angel, let us use her as a horrible example of what an angel is not; a vice of high art; a monster of such hideous mien that to be hated needs but to be seen at close range; something that, however familiar may be her face we cannot endure, nor pity, nor embrace.

An Antique

Pondering the possibility of the renewal of negotiations between Ruef and the Prosecution I was reminded of a very old story, so old that it must be getting back to its second childhood. It is of a man of a very taciturn disposition, who, riding in his gig over a bridge, turned about and asked his servant if he liked eggs. The man replied, "Yes, sir." Nothing more was said on the subject at that time. A year later when driving over the same bridge again, the master suddenly turned to his servant and said, "How," whereupon the man promptly replied, "Poached, sir."

Another esteemed contemporary is added to the list of my most valued exchanges. It will appeal to no prejudices; its tone will be judicial; and its argument while partisan will not be vehement, rhetorical or silly. It will be something entirely different from anything that has been uttered by the graft prosecution heretofore. Miss Miriam Michelson, the well known lady journalist and author of that best selling novel of morals, "In the Bishop's Carriage," will have complete charge of the Woman's Department, and will contribute occasional pieces of lighter literature in the form of short stories, serials and moral essays. Hoch der Kaiser

The question of the authorship of "Casey at the Bat" has been settled by Dr. Harry Thurston Peck, but now there is a dispute over the authorship of "Hoch der Kaiser!" the doggerel that made the late Rear-Admiral Joseph B. Coghlan famous when, by reciting the lines he came near to plunging this country into trouble with Germany. Since Coghlan's death the newspapers have credited him with being the author of the verses. This may be so, but the fact is that years before the occasion on which Coghlan brought them to the attention of the world they were recited in a beer-hall in this city by a reporter named Gordon, who represented himself as the author. Gordon was a man with a remarkable facility in versification. He was especially clever as a writer of Limericks, acrostics and lipograms. It was Gordon who was suspected of the deception practiced on the Examiner in the eighties by which that journal was made to represent that Monsignor Capel was the author of an obscene and sacrilegious acrostic. The verses recited by Coghlan are as follows:

Der Kaiser von das Fatherland

In the Public Eye

The talent for uttering an appropriate sentiment at a psychological moment is a gift with which few men are endowed. William J. Bryan proved himself the fortunate possessor of this gift some years ago when, with one burst of eloquence, he commanded the attention and stirred the emotions of all the people of this country. In a measure akin to Bryan's achievement was that of the Rev. Dr. Stephen S. Wise, rabbi of the Free Synagogue of New York, who took occasion some days ago to attack a number of judges and District Attorney Jerome for taking dinner with Richard Crocker. Dr. Wise has been expressing himself forcefully and epigrammatically on public questions for several years, and he has won the esteem of men in several cities in which he has discussed civic questions, but the psychological moment for him, the moment for a telling utterance of universal interest did not arrive until in New York his indignation was aroused by the homage publicly paid by exalted judicial officers to the ex-boss of unspeakable Tammany. The newspapers are now taking notice of Wise and incidentally exploiting his personality, the salient traits of his character, his aspirations, his propensities and his achievements. As Dr Wise has a brother in this city in the person of Mr. Otto Wise, one of the most successful representatives of the legal profession, he holds for us more than passing interest.

No Muzzled Pulpit for Him

Rabbi Wise is the son of a rabbi, the grandson of a rabbi, the scion of a family which has been identified with the rabbinical office without a break through hundreds of years. He is a young man animated by the very highest ideals and imbued with a passion for improving the condition of his fellow-men. He is a reformer of the type that endures. An insight into his character was afforded some years ago in New York when the trustees of the Temple Emanu El, the richest and most powerful synagogue in that city, asked him to name the terms on which he would take the position of rabbi of the congregation. His answer was that he would take it on condition that the pulpit be unmuzzled. He was not wanted on that condition, and he drifted out to Portland where he became prominent in public affairs. Two years ago he went back to New York where he assembled a congregation of four hundred men and women who attend divine service every Sunday morning at his Free Synagogue, which he describes as "a universalist church, —a church for all who do not fear the truth." The principles of the synagogue are, "no pews, and no dues; voluntary contributions and a democratic organization." Among the supporters of the synagogue are Jacob H. Schiff, Adolph Lewisohn, Issac Seligman and Henry Morgenthau.

"I think," said the strong-minded female, "that women should be permitted to whistle, don't you?"

"Certainly," replied the cynical bachelor. "There is no earthly reason why women should be denied the privilege accorded to locomotives and tugboats."

The Biggy Tragedy

It is perhaps fortunate that the body of Chief Biggy was identified beyond question, for now it is hardly likely that any further effort will be made to account for his disappearance by theories that cast a stigma on his reputation. Though the brutal newspapers that hounded Biggy to his death discreetly refrained from suggesting that he was a fugitive, cruel rumors that emanated from the local publicity bureau gained considerable circulation, especially in the interior of the State where the rural editor cultivates confidence in his own integrity by his vociferous acclamation of all self-appointed guardians of civic virtue. It was intimated that Biggy was hired by the higher-ups to connive at the killing of Haas, and that he had been paid an immense sum of money to vanish. He was even reported to have been seen in several cities. Biggy's faithful friends of the police commission, men who knew how unmerited was the abuse that was heaped upon him, how malevolent was the persecution to which he had been subjected, were greatly shocked at the dastardly efforts that were made to blacken his memory, and at the time of the recovery of the body they were engaged out of the noblest of sentiments in gathering material by which they hoped to effect his complete vindication. According to one of the commissioners with whom I have discussed the matter Biggy played a courageous part in the Haas tragedy; for while he was but technically responsible for that unfortunate creature's suicide he refused to shift any of the blame to the shoulders of men who might have found it difficult to avoid criticism. Yet Biggy's relation to the suicide was seized as a pretext for hounding him out of the police department with a view to getting control thereof. Though the catastrophe was not in accordance with design the plot was not altogether a failure; for Biggy is out of the department. Has not this little drama been of any avail as an eye-opener? Will the blind refuse to see? And by the way, is the rumor factory closed down for repairs? or shall we soon hear that the higher-ups hired somebody to shove Biggy off the boat?

No Spineless Judge for Johnson

Mr. Grove L. Johnson of Sacramento has once more achieved distinction; this time by uttering himself in opposition to the proposed code amendment designed to free our courts from partisan political influence. It appears that the principle of the proposed amendment cannot be reconciled with a principle which Mr. Johnson conceives to be fundamental. Mr. William Denman of the Commonwealth Club, who has been very active in stirring up sentiment in favor of the amendment, reports that it has been approved "in over a hundred letters from business men, lawyers and many judges both Federal and State, including Judge Gilbert, the presiding judge of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, and Judge Beatty, Chief Justice of the State of California." He adds: "In all the correspondence which the general newspaper notice of the proposed legislation has occasioned there has been but one writer who has said he was opposed to it—Mr. Grove L. Johnson, Assemblyman from Sacramento." Mr. Johnson's sentiments as exposed in a letter to Mr. Denman are as follows: "If your measure is presented to the Legislature, I will give it careful consideration. At present I am opposed to it. I am one of those who believes that the existence of our country depends upon having political parties. I believe a judge should be responsible to a political party, just the same as a coroner. It is idle to say that because a man is elected judge he thereby abandons his political opinions. I would rather have, speaking individually, an out and out partisan on the bench than a flabby spineless political mug-wump. The selection of judges at special elections was tried in this State and found to be a failure. I recognize the desire on your part to improve the judicial system, but think that you have started in the wrong way."

His Deft Smash

Singular as Mr. Johnson's sentiments may appear they are far from being unique. The principle which he upholds with respect to the importance of political parties is as old as the nation itself. Great statesmen have differed honestly thereon. But Mr. Denman is of the opinion that there cannot be two sides to this question. In a letter to the editor of Town Talk he says with exquisite sarcasm: "Those knowing Mr. Johnson feel certain that he did not mean to say this. However, Mr. Johnson's attitude on any legislative question affecting the purity of the bench is so significant that I am forwarding an exact copy of his letter, trusting you will give it the consideration it deserves." Now while I am in favor of the proposed amendment as far as it goes, and while I am aware that Mr. Johnson is a thorough-paced practical politican whose conduct as a legislator has been oftener censured than approved, I can readily believe that he is opposed to the amendment out of a sense of the possible inadvisability of substituting the multitude for a political party as the censor of the conduct of a judge. Mr. Johnson does not say that he is in favor of having political partisans on the bench. He says he prefers a partisan to a "flabby, spineless political mug-wump." And who would not? A political partisan is not disqualified from administering the law honestly, but a spineless judge is always inclined to consider his own interests rather than the rights of litigants. The spineless judge is a gallery player; and there is always the possibility of a crisis in which a gallery player on the bench may be inclined to coddle the multitude at the expense of the State. The strength of our Federal judicial system lies in the freedom from mob influence which it insures; if it has a serious imperfection it is not that there is partisanship in the selection of judges. Yes, Mr. Denman, there are two sides to this question. I am on your side, not because I think the amendment insures an absolutely independent judiciary, but because I regard it as a step in the right direction which, in view of current sentiment, is likely to be followed by another.

"I understand that your latest composition is becoming very popular."

"Yes," answered the thorough musician; "but, believe me, it has some elements of merit in spite of that fact."

A Plot in a Pub. Doc.

Strange things are frequently found in unexpected places. Who would think of looking for the hint of a romance or the motive of a rattling, rushing story of adventure, in the belly of an annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances of the nation? Yet that is where I found just that thing. Rummaging through the arid pages of Secretary Cortelyou's last communication to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, under the head of "Secret Service" following a statement that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, an unusually large quantity of plates, dies, molds, and contraband material were captured by the department, was this crude suggestion of a thrilling tale of the tropic seas: "Incidentally a contemplated revolution in a neighboring island failed when the counterfeit currency with which the insurgent troops were to be paid was seized by the agents of the division, and the fiscal agent was arrested and prosecuted for counterfeiting." What more could a Richard Harding Davis, a Phillips Oppenheim, or a Max Pemberton ask as the basis of a plot? Or if we would have the story a classic how brilliantly the hint would have been handled by Robert Louis Stevenson. As a humorous theme for O. Henry it can't be beat. And as a farce comedy for George Ade or a comic opera for George Cohan it is better than anything those prolific fun provokers have ever tried on the dogs. I believe that the weird genius of Quiller Couch could get something uncanny and creepy out of it. I am almost tempted to tackle it with my own little imagination. It is a story that tells itself. Imagine the possibilities of the situation: The island; a jungle of palms and a bunch of ragged, dirty mestizos; a chief conspirator who was once an overseer on a tobacco plantation and went into politics when the island declared its independence of Spanish tyranny; half a dozen other conspirators conspiring for loot; an arsenal of four stolen shotguns, one rifle and a machete apiece for the arm; no money; a gentleman adventurer from Maine or Oklahoma; the midnight conference in the back room of the lonely posada; the plot; the scene changes to a hut in the Tennessee mountains; moonshiners and counterfeiters; the gentleman adventurer disguised as a Pinkerton detective; (this is an original touch); the coiners at work; the jealous mestiza who has followed the gentleman adventurer from the island to find her lover making love to a rawboned belle of Tennessee; the dagger in the garter and the six-shooter in the belt; the women face to face; the baffled mestiza and the angry Tennessee lady; both swear vengeance against the fickle gentleman adventurer; the double betrayal; two bands of sleuths on the trail; the secret service men and the Pinkertons meet in the mountain gorge; the battle; the moonshiners to the rescue; the counterfeiters at bay; the plot thickens; suddenly the plot thins; the jealous rivals explain; hostilities cease; the detectives fraternize; the attack on the hut in the mountains; capture of the gentleman adventurer and his gang and $7,000,000 in Babbitt metal pesos; collapse of the island revolution for lack of sinews of war; everybody goes to work except the revolutionary mestizos—the gentleman adventurer and the conspirators doing time on the rock pile and the jealous ladies now reconciled, taking in washing for summer tourists at Palm Beach, Florida. Is He a Weaving Spider?

Much questioning is on the lips of clubmen and men about town concerning the status of James D. Phelan in the Bohemian Club at this time. Once there was none so popular; the only objection to genial Jimmy being, as expressed by a wit of the club, that he was so much richer than most of the members. Perhaps it was this reputation of unlimited wealth that lifted Mr. Phelan to some of the high pedestals in the famous club; perhaps it was the belief prevalent among the Bohemians that as Mr. Phelan was not really a bohemian, but somewhat instinctively inclined that way, he might unloose the strings of his purse occasionally for the profit and comfort, if not for the greater glory of the club. Perhaps that is one reason why he was made chairman of the club's building committee. Mr. Phelan had built massive and enduring structures for his own profit and his counsel had been exceedingly wise and generous in all the conferences that discussed the rebuilding of a city that was to be as beautiful as the dreams of the builders could make it; therefore it might happen that if Mr. Phelan were made chairman of the building committee of the club he would lend financial aid sufficient to accomplish the desire of the club for a palatial home; perhaps he might lift the mortgage on the Taylor and Post street site. But alas, Mr. Phelan has done nothing of the sort; there is no evidence that he has moved hand, pen or checkbook on behalf of the new club building. But he has sat like a chairman on a monument smiling at the other members of the committee; building only a castle in the air or a chateau in Spain. Now it has come to pass that the members of the club, weary with long waiting, have determined to build their club house in spite of Mr. Phelan. The project has been financed by William H. Crocker of the Crocker National Bank, on condition that the members shall subscribe $100,000 to the building fund. This has been done and Mr. Phelan's occupation as chairman of the building committee—but there is no committee. He is the Hamlet of the play, all right; but there is no support. The other members of the committee have resigned, and the resignation of Mr. Phelan is promised for the annual meeting of the club in January. Whether the financial assistance granted by Mr. Crocker was also conditional on the resignation of Mr. Phelan as chairman and as a member of the building committee may not be whispered beyond the hearing of the owl; but the incident has given rise to much gossip outside of the pale of the club, and many persons who admire Mr. Phelan's character for its nobility of purpose and philanthropy of intention, are asking if their expectancy and rose of the fair State, their glass of fashion and mould of form, has been put in the weaving spider class and told not to make himself quite so conspicuous hereafter in the activities of the Bohemian Club. As yet there has been no decisive or definite answer.

An Accidental Insult

As for Mr. Crocker it is not likely, as alleged; that he had the slightest intention of insulting Mr. Phelan. Familiar as he is with the history of the Bohemian Club, it is unlikely that he ever conceived it possible to abrade the thick hide of a man, who, through a long period of years has inspired all the wittiest sarcasms and served as the butt of all the most mordant radicule with which the Bohemians have been regaled. If Mr. Phelan is a man of weak irritability he must be highly skilled in the art of dissembling his feelings, for as an assimilator of insults he is without a peer in Bohemia, in corroboration of which fact I will submit the testimony of Dick Hotaling, Willis Polk, Rollo Peters and Jack Wilson. In this instance, I am sure, the insulting of Mr. Phelan was an accident. Moreover I am sure that no other member of the club similarly situated would complain of having been insulted. It happens that Mr. Phelan is peculiar in this,—that chairmaning is the one joy of his existence. He acquired the habit when he was chairman of a debating society at school, and ever since when there has been a chairman to be elected to anything Jimmy has appeared as a candidate. In several instances he has done more than this: he has rounded up his touts and his time-serving henchmen to capture the job for him. In the whole course of his life he has never resigned a chairmanship. So, taking cognizance of his consuming passion it is easy to understand why he ordered his kept journal to lambaste Crocker. As usual he directed that the people be told that he incurred Crock-er's emmity in the role of civic patriot. But Jimmy knows that he never excited anything less than Crocker's contempt and that he excited that when he was Mayor of the city by an exhibition of trimming that prompted Crocker's brother-in-law, Prince Poniatowski, to remark for publication that no gentleman would permit Mr. Phelan to enter his home. If Mr. Phelan had forgotten that matter he would not have been so zealous of late in some of his activities.

A fat woman entered a crowded street-car and, seizing a strap, stood on a gentleman's toes.

As soon as he could extricate himself, he arose and offered her his seat.

"You are very kind, sir," she said.

"Not at all, madam," he replied, "it's not kindness, it's self-defence."

Advice to a Stranger

I am glad to know that Upton Sinclair did not refuse to pay twenty-five cents for a portion of shredded wheat biscuits; also that he got some advertising out of his experience at the St. Francis. Sinclair is an author of the Socialistic cult and was once upon a time one of the best sellers in America. He wrote a book about the beef trust in which there was a very graphic account of the awful doings in the Chicago packing houses. It was the meat in the book that caused the sensation and incidentally netted for the author royalties fatter than any steer that ever went to his doom in the Chicago stockyards. With the profit of that lucky hit Mr. Sinclair built Helicon Hall and stocked it with queer people who lived on vegetables and Elbert Hubbard's philosophy until the Hall burned down and bankrupted the owner. Since that time Sinclair has been living on vegetables and the hope that he will some day produce another seller. Since his Helicon disaster he has been living on vegetables and the glorious climate of California; consorting with poets and literary ladies at Carmel-by-the-Sea; and constructing a thrilling melodrama of Socialism for production at one of the theatres in this city. He came to San Francisco the other day and "put up" at one of our highest priced hotels, which may be criticised as an action entirely contrary to his teachings and wholly at variance with the simple life he has been leading since he was one of the best sellers. But he didn't refuse to pay. He merely called attention to what he conceived to be an unreasonable charge. But Upton Sinclair should never kick about the price in San Francisco, no matter how unreasonable it may appear to be. It bores one to be reasonable. This is neither Chicago nor yet is it Boston. We do not eat to live in this city sitting serene and indifferent to fate beside the Golden Gate. We live to eat, to enjoy life, to get all there is in life out of the fickle, uncertain petulant thing. And we never haggle over the price; on the contrary we always tip the waiter. No, no, Upton; we live out here on the vast western verge, and when you come to live with us you must live as we do; otherwise, back to the stockyards for you; back to the cold culture of Boston; back, if you please, to the provincial arrogance of New York; but don't stay here to suffer the slings and arrows of a cosmopolitan bohemianism that makes no pretense of superior reason when the purse is light, but is a prince for spending when the goddess of the glittering wheel rolls our way scattering golden ducats to be scattered again on the rialto and in the region where the lights are blazing, where the music is inspiring and where joy is unconfined.

Young's Philosophy

Captain Lucien Young, who was recently appointed Captain of the Yard at Mare Island, is one of the most popular and amiable characters of the navy, compounded of bravery, wit and ebullience. He is famous for his good nature and rollicking disposition. Not long ago running across a man at the Fairmont whom he had known in Honolulu he surprised him by the hail: "Well, you damned little red-headed Kanaka, what are you doing here?" After an exchange of courtesies the captain was invited to have a bracer, which invitation was accepted. The host surprised Captain Young by ordering a Napa Soda for himself, saying that he had come to the conclusion that if he never took another drink in his life he would average pretty well, as he thought he had had enough. "Enough," said Young "enough? A man never can have enough. He may get too much, but he can never have enough."

A Cradle of Art

The pupils of Best's Art School are holding their annual fall exhibition at the school, 1623 Bush street, above Van Ness. As most of the students have been devoting their attention to illustration, the majority of the studies are in black and white, pastel and pen and ink, although a few of the exhibits are in oil. The work of the life class, especially that of J. Cook, Crawford, Mangel, Kempt and Day, displays industry, ability and originally. Miss Lawson has some good still-life pictures, and the clever sketches and illustrations by Lustig should not be overlooked. Mrs. Alice Best has a number of paintings in oil and water colors on exhibition, and the presentation is well worth a visit of art lovers. Mr. Best has some excellent small paintings on sale, which would make acceptable holiday offerings to the appreciative, especially as the prices are so reasonable. Best's Art School came into existence out of the necessities of the case. A group of artists, some of whom have since become famous, formed a class a number of years ago to study under Mr. Best, being convinced that the methods of the ordinary art school were time-wasting and that direct supervision and individual criticism would not only produce results in a short time, but bring out the distinctive character of each pupil's natural bent, instead of a more or less modified imitation of his master. Accordingly, the long, slow, tedious drawing from casts and still-life which in the majority of art school is insisted upon for a period of from six months to a year before the artist is admitted to the practical work of the life class was done away with, and instead of the bi-weekly visit and criticism, all work was gone over each day. Mr. Jules Pages, now one of the leading artists of Paris, gave his advice and suggestions, and the method of study outlined by him for the first class is still adhered to. Amongst those who formed the original coterie were Maynard Dixon, Gordon Ross, J. A. Cahill, Theodore Languth and G. W. Fisher. Mr. Pages has never lost interest in the school which he helped to found, and has extended to the pupils who wish to continue their studies in Paris the privilege of competing on an equal basis with his own pupils, an advantage which is highly prized by students of art from all parts of the world. Classes are assembled both day and evening, and the student may select oil or water color, pastel, or black and white. There are life and still-life classes and an out-door sketching club. Mr. Best is a landscape artist and illustrator, while Mrs. Alice Best's reputation as a painter of portraits, designer and poster artist is almost world wide.

By R. E. Mulcahy

New York Stock Exchange Securities have had their ups and downs during the past week. New high records were made in many of the railway lists, especially Southern Pacific and Union Pacific. A hardening of money rates began during the latter part of the previous week, which continues up to this writing. The heavy exports of gold caused some calling of loans, there was also the desire upon the part of bankers to get in funds to meet the January 1st disbursements. Call money advanced from 1½ per cent to 4 per cent. It is not expected high money rates will continue more than a week or ten days.

The weakness displayed in American Smelting and National Lead Securities caused a general unloading of stocks by the Pyramid Contingent. However, there appeared to be an urgent absorption of all offerings, resulting in only a slight decline in the better class of Railway Stocks. Missouri, Kansas and Texas found many friends, as did Colorado and Southern. These stocks advanced in the face of the general market weakness. From good sources comes assurance of ultimately very much higher prices for M. K. & T., Colorado, Southern Texas, Pacific and Interboro. It is more than likely another bull wave will start before the holidays, that will carry values much higher.

The earnings of American Car & Foundry and American Locomotive will show a large increase for the present quarter. The Steel Stocks have been inclined to weakness caused by talk of Tariff revision. This may be for market manipulation. It is quite noticeable those who are talking tariff reductions now, were the sellers of Steel Securities, at the top of the recent advance. It is possible they are now putting out bear talk for the purpose of securing their former holdings at a reduced price.

New York Central has recently been a market leader. It is rumored Mr. Harriman will be a strong factor in dominating the future policy of that property.

The Hill Stocks have shown more activity than usual. Many rumors are afloat favorable to a higher range of prices for them. The Copper Stocks have been disposed towards a lower level, regardless of the fact that the price of metal remains firm, and the consumptive demand fair to good.

The general market has had a fair reaction, and should take on new life again, and make a substantial advance. Conditions are favorable for a bull market; money rates will decline to their normal condition after January 1st.

The Government figures just compiled place the valuation of farm products of the United States at seven Billions, seven hundred and fifty millions of dollars, the greatest, by far, in the history of this country. Reports from winter wheat sown sections are very favorable. Fall plowing was accomplished in the most satisfactory manner. The ground has received plenty of moisture. All in all farming conditions could not be more promising than they are for the coming year.

The accepted general result of this year's Cotton Crop places it at 12,900,000 bales of 515 pounds each; there is a slight increase in the weight per bale over last year. While the crop is large, it will be found to be a short one before another crop is harvested. The low price for cotton now prevailing is the direct result of the Southern planters, who drove out future trading. They now find themselves unable to carry the crop alone, and are striving to have some of their recent laws abolished. Had these laws not been passed, Cotton would be selling well over ten cents per pound upon present conditions.

The recent decline of six and one-half cents per bushel in wheat was brought about by the heavy selling by Armour & Company, who accepted a most advantageous time to attack the market. It is claimed Patten, Bartlett & Frazier are carrying a load of twenty million bushels of May wheat, the battle has been between these contending parties, and will be a hard one. That wheat prices will go much higher before another harvest comes around is more than possible. The Argentine Crop will have its effect for at least a short time, much depending upon their early deliveries.

Ned Will Splurge Some

Too late for discussion in this week's issue, except as a prospective event, is the first of the Greenway Assemblies scheduled for Friday night of this week in the gorgeous white and gold room of the Fairmont. For this event, if I may be permitted to whisper it to my readers, the veteran leader of our fashionable herd, has been on his mettle ever since the Scott ball. There is nothing so wholesome as rivalry even in matters touching the entertainment of society as we shall doubtless perceive when Mr. Greenway gets into action, for the Scott ball was in the nature of a stimulus to the somewhat jaded

Petronius of local swelldom, and immediately thereafter his energies took on a sulphitic tone. The fact is that the One and Only Leader has observed symptoms of a disposition in certain quarters to compel, if not his abdication, at least a division of his power, and as a consequence he has whipped up his somewhat enervated faculties and taken hold of things which that puissant grip for which he was distinguished in the mad, glad days of his eventful youth. So be expectant of something more substantial than an iridescent dream on the occasion of the Assembly. To a friend Mr. Greenway has confided that it is to be an epoch maker. This is not to be one of the Greenway dances—mark you! They have passed with the old regime, as it were. Henceforth we are to have the "Greenway Assemblies." What's in a name? More than can be disclosed within the narrow limits of a regulation newspaper paragraph. The fact is that Ned is going to splurge some. Peradventure he may make that ten thousand dollar affair look like the proverbial thirty cents. The Greenway may look to others for incentive, but to none for the cachet of correctness or the qualities of elegance. Nor does Ned have to go gunning for quality. Depend on it—upper-tendom will be there with all its gay if not gaudy equipage. And for San Francisco's beauty and chivalry there will be a magnificent background of color. As for the supper—well of course that is where the ohs! and ahs! will come in. The Greenway is an epicure who delights in the products of Sybaris. Though his liver is not in prime condition he can find satisfaction in fourteen courses of Lucullan dainties. The stomach will sit in judgment on the first of the Greenway Assemblies.

The Bars To Be Let Down

The Colonial Dance invitation list is going to be reopened, and a few—of the men at least—who were overlooked will be taken into the fold. Already, they say, the men outrank the girls two to one, so why this idea in asking others? Or why do they not include a number of the girls who have up to date been "stung"? Some of the very nicest of the girls have been excluded and with no apparent reason. Of course if Mrs. Alexander insisted she might manage to squeeze in some of them when she is asking the extra men. Meanwhile there is much grumbling. The bachelors of San Francisco consider it a rank offense if they cannot get their dances taken when they want them, and they think more girls should be included. On the other hand several of the girls have asked to have their special men friends invited. So the list is to be reopened. Who is really the power behind the throne? And who of our local four hundred will be on the second list? And will they accept a belated invitation? These are some of the questions that are flying over the teacups.

Another Bud Coming Out

The news that Marian Miller has changed her plans and after all will make her debut this winter has been received with great rejoicing. The European trip has been postponed until late in the spring. Marian will be formally presented at a large tea the first week of January to be given in her honor by her mother, Mrs. C. O. G. Miller.

A talented Oakland girl. She is the niece of George Sterling, the poet.

The Bonniest of the Buds

Speaking of debutantes I am reminded that whilst this season's group is notable for its beauty and attractiveness there is one girl therein of such distinction that she is in a class by herself. I refer to Innes Keeney, who possesses all the best qualities of the most alluring type of American girl. Free from affectation, bubbling over with mirth, of nimble wit, there is not a more radiant, magnetic personality in all society. At the last Friday Night dance Innes Keeney was the centre of attraction. There was a shortage of men and some of the buds adorned the wall, but Miss Keeney might have had three partners for every dance. She certainly enjoys every function she attends. What a lot of lamentation there would be in the younger set if Innes Keeney should admit that there was anything in the rumor that she had already lost her heart to a Berkeley man in his senior year?

Queer Happenings

In our provincial aristocracy close attention is being paid these days to the social progress of some new arrivals who have plunged into the swim and with little encouragement have made considerable headway. They attended a big dance to which it is said the hostess had neglected to send them an invitation. Indeed I am told that she had never met her guests and was very much surprised at their presence. Which reminds me that there have been many queer happenings in society of late. Many new wrinkles have been introduced and some of them have been severely reprobated. Society has been shocked by droll stories imported from Paris and by Frenchy comments on the physical charms of pretty women. The sensibilities of society this season are much more easily agitated than they were in the days when "Addie" Mizner was flinging his pungent epigrams at the ears of pretty women.

The Parrotts in Their Chateau

From Europe comes word that the John Parrotts are in Rome over the Christmas holidays. Abby and Emilie write very enthusically of the change. They were the objects of much envy when they left town for Europe a year and a half ago, but they really have had very little excitement abroad. It certainly cannot be said that Mrs. Jack Parrott is either a very ambitious or a match-making mother. Every one thought that ere this the girls would make brilliant matches,—probably titled ones, and would mingle with the most exclusive continental society. But their mother's "nerves" have proved unequal to the task of chaperoning them and their life in Switzerland has been very tame. Their home, Chateau Soubriez, near Vevay, is delightfully rural but society there is not particularly interesting. Josephine, the youngest of the Parrott girls, who, if she were here would be making her debut this winter with her cousin, Katherine Donohoe, is rusticating in a convent. She is the prettiest of the four sisters, but Barbara is the most interesting and the most attractive. Emilie and Abby made their debuts the same year as their cousin, Vicomtesse de Tristan. They both acted as bridesmaids at her wedding and their many friends here are eagerly hoping that they may return to California for Marie Christine de Guigne's marriage in January.

Aftermath of a Wedding

The younger set is still talking about the Davis-McDonald wedding; how stately the bride looked coming down the aisle alone; what beautiful gowns the bridesmaids wore, and how perfect in every detail the new Davis house is. The Davises were living at the Fairmont until the wedding, and in consequence had their housewarming and their daughter's wedding all in one. Mrs. McDonald is the niece of Mrs. George Becker, Mrs. Harry Maxwell and Mrs. Joseph Fyfe, Jr., who before their marriages were known as the stunning Davis sisters of Ross Valley. On their return from the honeymoon trip Mr. and Mrs. McDonald will take a flat until their new apartment house is finished.

Will Wed in the New Year

The marriage of "little" Helen Thomas and Joseph Sefton, they say, will be the first of the New Year weddings. The date, I believe, has already been set, but the intimate few who have so far been told, declare for the present they are sworn to secrecy. Mr. Sefton is a wealthy man in his own right and their home in San Diego will be very beautiful. Besides the conventional engagement ring Mr. Sefton has presented his fiancee with a handsome diamond necklace, and his mother has showered her with many wonderful gifts. Helen Thomas was formerly of Sausalito. She belonged to the coterie of girls there who found the Army and particularly the Twenty-second Infantry especially attractive. Every one thought that one of the officers stationed on Alcatraz might succeed in winning her. Certainly Mr. Sefton is very much to be congratulated. His bride-to-be is remarkably pretty and attractive, and the only regret attached to the marriage is that San Diego will of necessity be her future home.

Society at the Polo Games

Quite the smartest gathering is that which attends the polo games every Sunday afternoon on the San Mateo field. As the early trains have not yet made the roads impassable a motor trip with luncheon at the Burlingame Club is quite the order of the day. So far the polo honors have been divided between the El Cerrito field and the Clark track, both of which are excellent polo grounds. In another fortnight the Army team will be up to the mark and some pretty play may then be expected. The enthusiasm for polo this year has proved greater than ever before. The smartest machines and traps turn out each Sunday. Quite the most conspicuous of these is the stylish little basket carriage which the Vicomtesse de Tristan drives herself. She is an expert horse woman, and her driving has been much admired for its grace and skill. The de Guignes have entertained at large house parties over all the games, and among those who are never absent from these affairs are Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Welch who always motor down with a number of friends in their three seated Pierce-Arrow. The Charles Clarks always serve a small tea at the pavilion on their grounds thus adding to the delightful informality of these meetings.

The Effect of Novelties

Whenever a new wrinkle in personal garnishment is introduced in San Francisco beholders view it with amazement and usually with disapprobation. Seldom do they ever consider the probability of the novelty of today becoming the commonplace of tomorrow, and consequently many women stultify themselves with the regularity of clockwork by adopting the very fashions which they have ridiculed. Of this phenomenon I was reminded the other night at the Orpheum when I heard comments on the members of a box party conspicious among whom were the beautiful Mrs. Gus Taylor and Mrs. George Newhall, both richly gowned. Mrs. Newhall looked odd to provincial observers, as she has just returned from New York with earrings that touch her shoulders and all the newest things in headgear.

A Grave Possibility

To all the talk against cigarette smoking by the women, those of the real smart set pay no attention. They go right on making little chimneys of themselves and even blowing the smoke out of their tip-tilted noses. They don't care a farthing what those mean nasty old newspapers say. Cigarettes are just the nicest things in the world,—so there. The society amateurs who appeared in "The Price of Money" at the Valencia puffed vigorously during the rehearsals, much to the discouragement of poor Frank Mathieu, who found it hard to distract their minds from their weeds to their lines. Then even—but then cocktails are another story. Most of the female smokers of local society are of the married set, but of late some of the girls have became addicted to the habit. There are two sisters, debutantes of last season who like their cigarette and don't care who knows. Up country after a long morning ride in cutaway coats, high boots and knickerbockers they lounge about the porch minus the coat, cigarette in mouth, and puff away to their hearts' content. Their mild dissipation was the subject of discussion the other evening. One young man was shocked to hear the news. "My God!" he exclaimed, "and one of them may become the mother of a future President!"

One of the Mills Twins Engaged

Another American girl to wed a foreign title! And once more the coin of the realm to be used in gilding the escutcheon of nobility is of Californian origin. The girl is Beatrice Mills, daughter of Ogden Mills and granddaughter of D. O. Mills, known from Newport to Burlingame as one of the Mills' twins, the other being Gladys Mills who was once reported engaged to Robert Gerry. The fair Beatrice is to wed the Earl of Granard. She is the intimate friend of the Clarence Mackays. The news of her engagement which leaked out this week must have come as a great surprise in New York, for the rumor was current there a month ago that she was engaged to Winthrop Ames of Boston. Her marriage will take place in the spring and will doubtless be celebrated with much pomp and circumstance, for Mrs. Ogden Mills is a woman who loves to splurge. She is of the very inner circle of the socially elect of Gotham.

Gossip From Berkeley

The Hotel Carlton in Berkeley is planning a happy Christmastide for the small guests of the hotel and, incidentally for the grown ones also, as the Christmas tree which is to be the feature of the Christmas Eve festivities will be followed by a dance. On Christmas Day an elaborate dinner will be served for which already a number of tables have been reserved by people on the outside. * * * A pleasant little affair of the week was the luncheon on Monday, at which Mrs. M. A. Foster entertained seven guests, the luncheon being followed by a few hours of bridge. * * * Mrs. Henry Rogers, who has been a guest at the hotel for a couple of months, had visiting her for a few days Mrs. C. A. Colburn of Reno, Nev. Mrs. Rogers will leave on Wednesday for Florida where she will be the guest of friends for several months. * * * Among recent arrivals at the Hotel Carlton are Mr. and Mrs. C. Edwin Holmes of Belvedere, who will spend two months in the university town; Mr. and Mrs. G. T. Gosling of Dallas, Texas; Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Benedict of New York, Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Weber of San Francisco, Mr. and Mrs. H. T. Patton, and A. L. Paine of the National Box and Lumber Co. of Aberdeen, who spent a week at the hotel.

A Dinner in Bohemia

George T. Wright, the attorney who but recently returned from an extended trip abroad, was the host at an elaborate dinner given at the Bohemian Club last Wednesday. The guest of honor was Antonio de Grassi, one of the foremost violinists of Paris and Italy. Fourteen guests, among whom were Dr. H. J. Stewart, Joe. D. Redding, Charles Fields, Dr. H. P. Carlton, Dr. J. Wilson Shields and Mr. Bachelor, participated in the affair, after which they had the additional pleasure of listening to a number of selections performed by their fellow-guest. The advent of Signor de Grassi is of more than usual interest since, in addition to his musical reputation he chose a fair Californian for his bride, Miss Winifred June Morgan of Oakland. Miss Morgan is herself a talented musician and it was when in Paris in pursuit of a course of study that she encountered her fate. On her recent return from abroad she had an experience somewhat amusing and exasperating. Some of her fellow-passengers on the Atlantic liner conceived the idea that she was the daughter of the multi-millionaire J. Pierpont Mor-

Even the reporters took a hand when the steamer was docked, though they should have known better. It was amusing at first, but the sugar coating soon dissolved, leaving only the bitter pill, and the victim was in anything but a frame of mind desirous of repeating the experience.
